City Commission rejects Cohen-Esrey, 5-0

▶ The history of the Cohen-Esrey proposal.

On March 3, the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board first considered the proposed Cohen-Esrey annexation of a 10.2-acre tract of land in the Northview area of Manhattan to be used for a low-income housing project.

The planning board recommended approval of the annexation.

A public hearing in front of the planning board was then scheduled for May 5.

The board tabled the proposal several times during the summer.

At the Sept. 4 hearing, the planning board voted against the proposed development, recommending the commission not approve the development.

The issue was then sent to the commission for approval at its Oct. 7 meeting. After five hours of debate, the proposed development was tabled until the commission's next legislative session Tuesday.

For more information about those meetings, go to the eCollegian archives at collegian.ksu.edu/search and enter the words "Cohen-Esrey."

The Manhattan City Commission rejected Cohen-Esrey's Planned Unit Development annexation proposal for the Northview neighborhood in a 5-0 vote Tuesday night.

Members of the Northview neighborhood's Citizens for Stable Neighborhoods and other concerned community members were present for the decision. Tracy Taylor, president of Cohen-Esrey, accompanied by his staff of professionals and legal counsel, also attended the meeting to hear the commission's decision.

Karen Davis, Manhattan's director of community development, presented the commission with the proposal for the annexation. After no questions were posed by the commissioners, the floor was opened to public comment.

> Can the city afford to go along with a development like this? I just don't think we're ready for this yet.

People on both sides of the controversy were given opportunity to rehash the issues and make final comments.

Concerned residents reminded the commission that their biggest concern was the lack of adequate drainage in that area, and that the new development would aggravate the problem.

Cohen-Esrey stood by its claims that a greater drainage problem would not be created and pointed out that Manhattan city staff had already approved the viability of the new development.

After public comment, Commissioner Karen McCulloh moved to deny the annexation of Cohen-Esrey's development. Commissioner Steve Hall seconded the motion. With that, the commissioners gave their views on the proposal.

Commissioner Roger Reitz commended Cohen-Esrey for its professionalism and organization. However, Reitz posed a question to the commissioners.

Proposed KSU Stadium expansion

- Student seating currently in sections 24-27, outside edges of upper deck guarantees 7,500 student seats.
- Plan 1 has student seating in sections 24-27, section G, parts of sections A and H and guarantees at least 9,000 student seats.
- Plan 2 has student seating in sections 24-27, sections A, B, G, H, I, J and guarantees at least 10,000 student seats.
- Both plans include a new, seat-back section and additional seating added to the East side.
- Entrances, concessions and restrooms will be revamped on east and west sides.

Creation of privilege fee for stadium expansion to be voted on by students

KSU Stadium will be growing.

Next month, students will decide whether they want to fund part of the project through the creation of a new privilege fee.

Max Urick, director of the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, said public demand for quality seats is the motivation for the expansion proposal, which could add as many as 10,000 seats to the stadium.

> The Department of Intercollegiate Athletics is required to reserve 7,500 students seats. However, 9,471 were sold to students in 1997 and 9,958 were sold to students in 1996.

The athletic department has proposed a stadium expansion privilege fee to fund the project. Under its proposal, students would pay a per-credit-hour fee to finance about one-third of the expansion.

The proposed addition to the stadium, which would be complete for the 1999 football season, is centered around two proposals. Both involve the creation of a privilege fee until the 15-year expansion bond is paid off. Urick estimated the final total for the project to be between $10 million and $11 million.

For a $1 per-credit-hour fee, students would be guaranteed 10,000 permanent student seats instead of the current 7,500-seat guarantee. For 50 cents per credit hour, the athletic department would reserve 9,000 student seats.

Under both proposals, ticket prices for students would be frozen for four years. Also, a special section would be created at football and basketball games for recent graduates. K-State alumni could purchase season tickets at 66 percent of the public rate for two years after graduation.

Regardless of whether students vote for expansion, some sort of addition to the stadium will take place, Urick said. The upper deck on the stadium's east side will be enlarged to add more general public seating and restrooms. Concession facilities, built in 1962, will be remodeled, and the Dev Nelson Press Box will be expanded to add more luxury suites and club seating, Urick said.

A student body referendum next month will put the decision of whether to create a fee to a campuswide vote.

Urick said he recognizes the concern that students who don't attend football games would still be paying for stadium expansion under the athletic department proposals. However, he said, the football program benefits the university as a whole, which makes a privilege fee practical.

"There's value to the university in having a quality athletic program. It affects the spirit and morale of the university," Urick said. "It also builds pride and high self-esteem. It's an activity that cuts across all ages, classes and curriculum probably more than any single activity at the university."

He said some students' concerns about paying for the stadium when they don't use it can be likened to other situations, such as the privilege fee for Lafene Health Center or school district bond issues.

"It's not unlike a community where someone is against voting for higher taxes for a school system because they have no children in the schools," Urick said. "The quality of the university as a Student leaders' opinions on expansion mixed on whether to create privilege fee

Student Body President Tim Riemann has heard the proposals.

He knows about the plans of the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics to expand KSU Stadium. He knows the creation of more student seating in the stadium hinges on the creation of a privilege fee for stadium expansion.

He said he wishes there was another way.

"Overall, I would like to see a stadium expansion," Riemann said. "But I think it's unfortunate that the entire student population has to pay money to subsidize the benefits received by a small part of the population."

Increases in ticket prices could not be used to help finance the expansion's 15-year bond, because ticket sales cannot be counted as dependable revenue. If ticket-price increases can't fund the expansion, private contributions would be another alternative, Riemann said.

> ▶ The editorial
> The editorial board suggests students use the time provided to study the proposal and encourages the powers that be to make voting areas available to everyone.

"Private contributions are always the No. 1 answer in my mind. I think it would be too bad that 20,000 students would have to pay a privilege fee so that 9,000 or 10,000 could get football tickets," he said.

Aaron Truax, veterinary medicine student senator and Privilege Fee Committee vice chair, also questions the creation of a fee. Financial constraints on students because of the fee increase should be considered, he said.

Qualified admissions remains on schedule

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — A plan requiring Kansas high school students to take specific courses and meet academic requirements to attend the six Kansas Board of Regents universities is on schedule, a legislative committee was told.

The Legislative Educational Planning Committee — a joint oversight committee for higher education — was updated Tuesday on the status of the qualified-admissions program enacted by lawmakers in 1996.

Steve Jordan, Board of Regents executive director, said the qualified-admissions program would start on schedule for the fall semester in 2001 and that it wouldn't reduce the number of those attending regents universities.

"We're going to retain more students in college. This isn't about keeping kids out of college. This is about keeping kids in college," Jordan said.

> We're going to retain more students in college. This isn't about keeping kids out of college. This is about keeping kids in college.
> • Steve Jordan
> Board of Regents executive director

There are no admission requirements for Kansas residents to attend any regents university now, other than to be a high school graduate.

Under the qualified-admissions program, high school students in a pre-college curriculum will have to graduate with a 2.0 average, or have an American College Testing score of at least 21, or rank in the top one-third of their graduating class.

Beyond that, students wanting to attend any regents university must complete four years of English, three years each of natural science, math and social sciences and one year of computer technology.

Jordan said his office has been working with the state Board of Education, which oversees public schools and the community colleges, to make sure the program is up and running by 2001.

For instance, he said 509 high school educators this year attended eight workshops dealing with qualified admissions.

He said all high schools are capable of offering the courses required under the qualified-admissions program, but in some cases it will mean they will have to change some of the courses offered.

"It is a question of whether they have the right mix," Jordan said. "But the time will allow the high schools to shift resources."

Jordan said 78 percent of Kansas high school graduates go on to some type of post-secondary education — universities, community colleges or technical schools. He said that figure was 66 percent a decade ago.

He said there are about 80,000 students enrolled in the six regents universities — K-State, the University of Kansas, Wichita State University, Emporia State University, Pittsburg State University and Fort Hays State University.

Gang members suspects in attack, beating in south central Kansas

BURRTON, Kan. — Police in this south central Kansas town are seeking members of an alleged youth gang that, in recent days, has been linked to the beating of a girl and an attack on a handicapped man.

Three youngsters were being sought Monday in the attack on the girl, Burrton Police Chief Shaun Corcoran said.

That was on the heels of another incident in which four other alleged gang members — three juveniles and 18-year-old Michael Thompson — were arrested on suspicion of kidnapping, battery and assault.

The four were arrested after a 19-year-old disabled man told authorities he was threatened and sexually assaulted by them last Thursday.

Corcoran said the 19-year-old man had been "initiated" into the group against his wishes.

When the gang members asked the man to join the group, he declined. Corcoran said the gang members tied up the victim, held a butcher knife to his throat and threatened to kill him if he didn't let them sodomize him.

In the other incident, Corcoran said the alleged female victim was in the custody of the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services and was attending school in Burrton.

He said the girl didn't want to become a gang member either and her assault took place last Friday.

Campus shooting leaves 1 dead in apparent drug deal gone bad

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Gunfire erupted during a drug deal in a residence hall room at Tennessee State University, killing one person and seriously wounding another who was apparently trying to rob the others.

Metro Police Homicide Detective E.J. Bernard said the shootings happened Monday evening at Boyd Hall on the TSU campus.

Police believe five people, at least one a TSU student, were present in the sixth-floor room when one of them attempted to rob others of money or drugs, Bernard said.

One participant was shot in the head and died; the other, believed to be the robber himself, was wounded in the abdomen and was in fair condition this morning after surgery at Vanderbilt University Medical Center.

The violence came on the first day of a campuswide "crime-free week" at Tennessee State.

University officials had planned to use the week to promote safety on campus. Instead, they opened a building to provide all-night counseling to students troubled by the shooting.

Students become ill after lunch at Olathe elementary schools

OLATHE, Kan. — About 125 elementary school students at different schools became ill with flu-like symptoms after a lunch of burritos that came from a packaged food distributor.

The district reported Monday that students complained of abdominal pain and some vomited after eating the burritos. Students were sent to a hospital during school hours, officials said, but some were sent home. Others were treated and remained in school.

The illnesses were reported at 21 of the district's 25 elementary schools.

Woman ordered to give computer to man accused of raping her

PONTIAC, Mich. — A woman who said she was sexually assaulted by a man she met through an online chat room has been ordered to turn over her computer for examination by the defendant's lawyer.

Circuit Judge Alice Gilbert issued the order Oct. 8 after the defendant said another computer user told him the woman had bragged online — in a chat room called "Man Haters" — about making up the story.

The woman was also ordered to reveal her password and online aliases.

Sean A. Crockett, 26, is accused of pulling a knife and attacking the woman Feb. 28 after they went out on a date.

Prosecutors said they will appeal the ruling. They complained that there would be no way to limit the defense attorney's inspection of the woman's computer files.

Those files might contain personal information or financial records, prosecutors said. They also said information might be added or deleted from the computer's memory.

"In my view, turning over somebody's computer these days is the same as asking to go through their diary or mail," prosecutor John Pietrofesa said.

Blood donation site to open in January

▸ KANSAS BLOOD SERVICES TO offer donors a different environment.

LESLIE NACHTRAB
staff reporter

K-State students and Manhattan residents will soon have the opportunity to give blood in a different way, and in a different environmen,t than before.

Kansas Blood Services, based in Topeka, is opening a site in January at 11th and Moro streets in Aggieville. Adrianne Evans, director of recruitment and community relations for Kansas Blood Services, said they will offer an environment not available at other blood-donation centers.

Evans said donors will be able to sit in large, comfortable lounge chairs and watch television with headphones.

"We're making it as easy as possible for people to give the gift of life," Evans said.

The biggest difference, Evans said, was the site will be an automated collection site. At each station, a mini-centrifuge will pump out the blood and automatically separate its components. Whatever components the center is not collecting that day are put back into the donor along with a saline solution to make up for the loss in volume.

"It's better for the donor, because there won't be any loss in volume," Evans said. "That's what usually causes the reactions people have after giving blood."

Evans said the process takes a little longer than without the centrifuge, but an advantage is it uses a smaller needle.

To accommodate parents, there are plans for an enclosed play center for children at the site. The center will also have longer hours, keeping the site open until 8 p.m. at least three days a week.

> We're making it as easy as possible for people to give the gift of life.
> • Adrianne Evans
> director of recruitment and community relations for Kansas Blood Services

Kansas Blood Services already has one site in Topeka, one in Lawrence and will be opening another in Topeka on Monday.

Evans said there were two reasons Kansas Blood Services decided to open a site in Manhattan. The center serves 10 counties in Kansas, but one of the areas it didn't serve was Manhattan. Also, Evans said the fact that Manhattan is a college town helps.

"Kids are really good about giving blood," Evans said. "College kids understand it's a civic duty. Also, we're looking for healthy people, and I can pretty much count on college students being healthy."

Evans said she didn't think the opening of Kansas Blood Services would cause any competition with other blood collection sites in Manhattan.

"There's a Red Cross in Lawrence, and we have one in Lawrence," Evans said. "We've never had a problem there."

STD educators present awareness tips to BSU

KERRY BOYDSTON
staff reporter

Black Student Union was reminded about sexual responsibility from K-State students at its Tuesday night meeting.

Representatives from STD, HIV/AIDS Peer Educators urged members to protect their partners as well as themselves concerning sexual intercourse. They also identified various campus resources that provide testing for sexually transmitted diseases.

BLACK STUDENT UNION

"If you don't protect yourself, you can infect each other with sexually transmitted diseases, possibly multiple times," said James Lehman, SHAPE educator. "Fifty percent of college students lie about their sexual history, so you need to be really careful and trust the person you are with."

Lehman also said sexually transmitted diseases, including HIV, don't discriminate against any ethnic group.

"Everyone should be concerned for their individual safety. This isn't a racial issue," Lehman said. "It doesn't care what color you are or where you come from."

Some BSU members said there was a need for more awareness in their communities.

"Even through increased education and awareness, African-Americans are the only group not declining in the numbers of people infected with HIV," Irysha Walker, BSU member, said. "We're not doing our job as African-Americans."

Jason McGowan, BSU vice president, said this program was a good one to present to BSU members.

"This shows that a lot of people need to protect themselves and learn what to do. Presentations like these help BSU members get out and active in BSU and hear good information at the same time," he said.

Media, audience discuss diversity

Coverage of multicultural events by media addressed at forum

JAKE PALENSKE
staff writer

The Society of Professional Journalists sponsored a diversity forum Tuesday night to discuss coverage of multicultural events on campus.

The discussion was led by a panel of representatives from the Collegian, KSDB-FM 91.9, KKSU-AM 580 and the Royal Purple.

The general topics of discussion between the panelists and the audience centered around the need for more media coverage of multicultural events on the K-State campus. Audience members suggested ways to increase communication between student organizations and campus media outlets.

JEFF COOPER/Collegian

PAMELA MANNING, senior in mass communications, poses a question to Scott Ladd, editor in chief of the K-State Collegian, in a forum sponsored by the Society of Professional Journalists on Tuesday night in the K-State Student Union. Representatives from KKSU-AM 580, KSDB-FM 91.9, the Collegian and the Royal Purple were on hand to discuss diversity issues in campus media.

Many members of the audience said they felt their organizations were not receiving consistent coverage in the Collegian and Royal Purple and on the campus radio stations.

"Last year, the BSU Meet and Greet activity at the beginning of the school year got great coverage in the Collegian, but this year we hardly received any coverage at all, even though the event had grown," Colette McLemore, president of Black Student Union, said.

Audience members also expressed concern about some language in Collegian articles that was considered offensive by some people.

The panelists noted the relevance of the audience concerns and explained the measures being taken to eliminate any offensive language or terminology in campus coverage.

"We are monitoring the content of our published stories more than we used to. We are also making an effort to educate our writers about what language is appropriate in these instances," said Scott Ladd, Collegian editor in chief and senior in print journalism.

Ladd also said the Collegian staff has been issued a stylebook addendum that includes methods to avoid biased language.

J.J. Kuntz, editor in chief of the Royal Purple and senior in hotel and restaurant management, explained how her staff would benefit from more story ideas from students.

"People can contact us with story ideas through e-mail, phone calls, mail or just stopping by our office. We have an open-door policy and encourage student input," Kuntz said.

Brandi Hertig, president of SPJ and sophomore in print journalism, closed the meeting by informing the audience that another diversity forum is in the works.

Hertig also said SPJ welcomes any input people might have on ways to increase communication between multicultural organizations and campus media outlets.

Stadium expansion vote should represent opinion of all students

One of the biggest issues facing K-State is the "privilege" fees students pay every semester. This year, students are paying $502 in fees to support campus services like Lafene Health Center, the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics and the K-State Student Union.

Privilege fees could increase from that number next year, however. A referendum vote next month will determine the opinion of the student body concerning the creation of a privilege fee that will fund nearly one-third of the expansion of KSU Stadium, a multi-million dollar project.

The creation of a privilege fee involves every student at K-State.

Annually, each full-time student could be paying $12 for a 1,500 increase in guaranteed student seats or $24 for a 2,500 increase in guaranteed student seats, depending on which option, if any, is approved by the student body.

The plan is to have the referendum vote in the Union, but will that represent the true opinion of students?

If the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics wants to gather the opinion of the entire student body, polling shouldn't be restricted to the Union.

There are students at K-State who will not be able to go to the Union to vote on this issue, but does that make their opinions less important?

Every student deserves a chance to vote. This includes students in the school of veterinary medicine and students who live in the residence halls and Jardine Terrace Apartments. These students should not be forced to go to the Union to vote.

The referendum should represent a campuswide election. The referendum should come to them, not vice versa.

The chance to vote should not be the only issue the athletic department should consider when conducting the referendum.

Education is vital.

Students should be able to go into the voting booth and make an informed decision, and the responsibility of educating students falls squarely on the shoulders of the athletic department.

If it wants more student money, it should educate every student on this campus. And not just students who reside in living organizations — every student has a right to know what could happen to their fees.

If the athletic department can spend $10 million to expand the stadium, can't it spend a few extra dollars to get the true opinion of the student body?

Fee$ give campus the shaft

Let's dis the status quo and reinvent student fees in a hip-hop context, baby

There's a scene in the movie "Shaft" in which John Shaft throws one of arch-enemy Bumpy's hoodlums out a window several stories above the seamy streets of old Times Square.

Catching the action in sharp, instant takes, the viewer is literally thrown from the interior of Shaft's somewhat typical private investigator's office to a floating place outside the window where the hood seems to hover ever-so-briefly before falling to the ground.

The point in recalling this visually brilliant scene in Kansas photographer Gordon Parks' classic film starring Richard Roundtree is to make the best analogy possible to the grueling, absurd process of student fees at K-State. Every year, the process rises from the primordial sludge of campus boredom, takes the student fees by the collar, roughs 'em up (can you dig it?) and tosses them out a plate-glass window.

That stunned feeling we experience at the end of the process is our hovering period outside the window, right before we fall to our asphalt deaths. Maybe it's not that bad, for some, but perhaps there are ways to enliven our student fees while giving the campus a needed boost in some less-than-extraordinary areas. Hence, a list of possible fees for your consideration:

• Under-the-Table Gifts Fee: This fee would address the need of all universities to offer prospective students free gifts, such as cars, clothes, money, drugs and women (or men, depending on the team). The Kansas press has tried for years to prove how the heavily recruited art students have been receiving new Ford Mustangs for the past five years, but all to no avail.

It just strikes one as being somewhat unfair to lavish so much money on art students at the expense of the remaining students. What's next — a special academic center just for art students?

• Squirrel Planning Fee: Long an issue near and dear to this columnist's heart, this campus is long overdue in addressing the unprecedented baby boom of squirrels during the past three years.

This fee would provide free family planning and public housing, to be located in the Northview school district. The fee would also pay for the construction of a 50-foot bronze statue commemorating Ezekiel P. Farrell Seth-Childs, the first squirrel to migrate west after the 1833 walnut crop failed in Ireland.

The only thing preventing this from absolute passage is the recent election fraud in the Squirrel Teamsters Union, which has dealt a serious blow to squirrel credibility nationwide.

• Vision 20/20 Fee: Little do students know the Kansas Board of Regents' Vision 20/20 program is no less than a grand urban renewal policy aimed at conservative Kansas college towns. This fee would help to construct a colossal, floating pyramid city in Kansas, consisting of 20 million inhabitants, that would replace the cities of Manhattan, Ogden, Junction City and the Turnpike Hardee's at Matfield Green. Occupants would be required to wear only Tommy Hilfiger clothes and eat at shabby chain restaurants serving Soylent Green. The entire basement level 0001 would be a Wal-Mart. K-State would fill floors 3002 through 4128, with the exception of Parking Services, which would be relocated to Anchorage, Alaska.

• The Student Governing Association and Intercollegiate Department of Athletics Legal Defense Fund: Although this fee speaks for itself, it would require that all recipients of this fee money would need to visit a Buddhist monastery in California for a party and pretend not to know it was really a fund raiser. They would also have to be hosts of several televised coffee klatsches for $50,000 a person at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

Use of this fee automatically qualifies the said beneficiary a job as leader of the free world or entrance to Stanford University.

• Make-Me-Relevant Fee: This fee goes to those poor, irrelevant campus organizations that have no readily identifiable cause or reason for existence other than to provide members with résumé entries and a shaky platform for launching attacks and publicity campaigns on what they perceive to be important issues.

The money would help provide more interesting grounds for their attacks and self-important publicity events so as to amuse the rest of us. This century's social revolution might be over, but you can't blame these guys for trying.

• Casino Fee: In a shrewd election-year scheme, Gov. Bill Graves declares K-State a reservation and turns Hale Library into an Excalibur Casino, complete with King Arthur's pageant and a special Merlin the Magician show every 30 minutes from 4 to 11 p.m. (two-drink minimum and a free magic wand for kids). Union Program Council promises a 1998 main-stage line-up of Tom Jones, Debbie Reynolds and Isaac Hayes on a killer comeback.

Damn right.

Residence hall life may not be for sanitary-at-heart

Make sure you bring ointment if you plan on living in residence halls.

I'm getting state-sponsored athlete's foot. It tingles, it itches and it stings.

No, college fungus doesn't feel any different than the good old, homegrown kind. Still, it's a milestone. A rite of passage. A landmark.

It's an official welcome to dorm life.

"Welcome, freshmen," the sign in front of my Moore Hall home should read. "Get ready for a year of fungus-ridden community showers, strange smells and a complete lack of personal space."

That would be truth in advertising.

Sure, residence hall life is a chance to meet new people and experience new things — anyone in the admissions department will tell you that. But it's also a chance to shower in flip-flops, park miles away from anything on campus and brush your teeth over a sink with the remains of someone else's macaroni and cheese.

Paying for the privilege of sacrificing privacy and hygiene in exchange for cheap room and board might be part of the "freshman experience." And communal living might help students get a feel for K-State's campus before they take advantage of off-campus housing.

But no matter how thick the sugar coating, and no matter what the advantages, the quality of residence hall life boils down to one word.

Bathrooms.

I moved into Moore Hall on Aug. 25. I've felt clean twice since Aug. 25. I've been home twice since then, too. You do the math. For those who haven't experienced life in a residence hall, let me fill in the blanks in the recruiting pitch that begins, "It's a really good thing to do your freshman year."

The alarm sounds. You silence it with the touch of the snooze button, begging for five more minutes of sleep. Two minutes later, an alarm two doors down goes off. This one doesn't stop — its owner is at home, visiting his parents and sleeping in. His alarm will continue to sound for about two months.

Fully awake, you stumble for the bathroom. If, like me, you are male and wear corrective lenses, you will be shocked. In your blurred, predawn vision, you see a woman standing in the middle of the room wearing only a pair of white panties.

Seconds after your scream, the underwear-clad female speaks — in a male voice. "Hey," he/she/it says, "how's it going?"

You don't reply, speechless as you realize that the near-naked bathroom girl of your dreams is actually a long-haired man shaving in tighty-whities.

The horror continues.

Step into the shower, or, rather, wade into the shower of your choice. Feel the bacteria oozing between your toes like mud on the bottom of a pond on a hot summer day. It's gross, but hey, that's what it feels like.

Turn on the water and wait for the inevitable toilet flush, sink use, fire on the third floor or dripping pipe in 503 to change the water-temperature scheme for the entire building. The shower head will click slightly, and then all hell breaks loose. The temperature changes from hot to cold in a heartbeat.

Ever seen "Seinfeld"? Shrinkage.

Your only protection from the elements is a flimsy, white shower curtain. Add the draft from a few constantly open windows, and the curtain becomes a second skin. Clinging to your wet, soapy frame, it blows inside the shower and sticks to you like glue. Now everyone else's germs aren't just on your feet. You shudder.

Step out of the shower and onto the wet, slippery tile floor.

Attempt to dry off with the towel that was sprayed with water when the curtain blew in and stuck to you because the wind was blowing because someone opened the window because they were hot and needed air.

It won't work.

Wet and disgruntled, you trudge back to your room. On the way, you take your first deep breath of the morning. Your nostrils meet with the odor of the trash chute at the end of the hall. It reeks.

The alarm clock down the hall is still going off. Others trudge toward the bathroom, preparing to shower with your germs and preparing to buy discount ointment that smells like a rest home to make the pain of athlete's foot go away.

Next year, I vow I won't live in a residence hall. I won't put myself through this trauma again. I'm going to stand up and fight the admissions representative who tells freshmen living off campus is a "mistake."

Someday, I'm going to spread the word and right the wrongs of freshman housing.

Someday, I'm going to find that damn alarm clock.

United Way thanks departments for generosity

Dear Editor,

On behalf of the K-State United Way Coordinating Committee, we would like to take this opportunity to thank all of the K-State departments that so willingly donated prizes to the KSU United Way, "The Power of U" campaign.

Due to their generosity, the prize activities are helping to make the campaign fun while reporting for a very worthy cause. The names of the departmental volunteers who returned the majority of their department's envelopes by Oct. 21 were entered into a drawing for these prizes.

By the same token, donors who make a contribution and return their envelopes by Oct. 31 will also be entered in an additional drawing.

Blues Festival to fill Forum Hall with jazz tunes

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

The Purple Blues Jazz Festival, billing itself as having "blues so deep it's purple," kicks off at 8 tonight with some Miles Davis tunes.

This year's festival, in Union Forum Hall, features guest soloist Charles Perkins of Kansas City, Kan., an alto saxophonist who also plays the flute and other woodwinds. Perkins has played at New York's Blue Note as a featured soloist at the Wichita Jazz Festival, with the Count Basie Orchestra and with singer Lena Horne.

▶ Performance tonight. The Purple Blues Jazz Festival, featuring guest soloist Charles Perkins, begins at 8 p.m. in Forum Hall. Admission is free.

Perkins will join four billed acts for the festival: the Jazz Lab Band A, the flute septet Flute Juice, the Concert Jazz Ensemble and the K-State Jazz Quintet.

Among the selection highlights, Miles Davis' "Milestones," with a new arrangement by Dennis Wilson, director of jazz studies, will be performed by Flute Juice. Another Wilson arrangement of "Milestones," done for a 1970s Lionel Hampton show, is a CJE selection.

Wilson said the arrangements for both groups are difficult. He said the complexity of the piece represents a departure for Flute Juice, a group that debuted at last year's festival.

"They have come a long way," Wilson said. "It's more intelligent. It's a different group."

Flute Juice will also perform a jazz classic, "Take the A Train," with an arrangement by Wilson. The group's last selection, "Blue Flute," was composed and arranged by Wilson and will feature Perkins.

Although not blues, per se, the CJE has selected two Latin numbers, "Latin Import" and "Mira Mira."

Jena Pralle, senior in music education and bass player in CJE, said the Latin numbers were selected because they are something the group doesn't get to play often.

"It has more rhythm," Pralle said. "It's something you can't count, you have to feel. The blues is easier for us because it's something jazz groups do a lot."

Members of the CJE, along with Wilson, visited Gov. Bill Graves on Oct. 15 at the Statehouse for the annual proclamation accompanying the K-State Jazz Festival.

The 1998 Festival, featuring the Count Basie Orchestra for the third straight year, will honor Dizzy Gillespie. Graves' proclamation declares Feb. 14, 1998 — Valentine's Day — as Dizzy Gillespie Day in Kansas.

Wilson, who returned Tuesday from a Gillespie Foundation fundraiser in New Jersey, said Graves said the only thing that could keep him from coming to the festival is the Legislature.

Wilson leaves again Friday for the Kennedy Center concert "A Celebration of America's Music," which will be broadcast at a later date on NBC. Vice President Al Gore will greet musicians and guests at a reception after the concert.

Health, Fitness Tour draws crowds

TONYA ALLOWAY

Students on campus Monday and Tuesday had the opportunity to participate in boxing matches, wall climbing, gladiator duels and bungee events.

The Jeep/Plymouth Health and Fitness Tour made its annual stop at K-State this week. The two-day tour was very successful, said John Tocar, director of special events for the tour.

Everyone has their own ideas as to the best event of the tour.

Jarrod Sheldon, freshman in criminology, said his favorite event this year was the boxing event.

"I came here last year, too," Sheldon said. "You get to beat up on people, but you don't hurt them."

Rob Mouser said he saw the boxing event Monday when he was driving by on his moped, so he made a special trip Tuesday to take part in the tour.

"I've done just about everything so far," Mouser said.

Other students liked the bungee challenge. Chris Handlin, freshman in kinesiology, said he liked this event because it was challenging.

"Plus, I won," Handlin said.

Melissa Perritte, sophomore in graphic design, said she liked the tour because it had events rather than just booths.

"I had a lot of fun," Perritte said. "I like stuff better that you can actually get into instead of just shops."

Steve Ewing, event operator, said the gladiator duel was a popular event because it was challenging. He also said the operators had a lot to do with whether people participated in that event.

Rick Trevino worked at the Perry Ellis booth, one of the sponsors of the tour. The booth had a raffle for a $100 gift certificate and also gave away Lipton iced tea to students.

"There are a lot of people coming by because they want to win the drawing," Trevino said.

Tocar said the Health and Fitness Tour travels to various universities throughout the school year.

"We travel from campus to campus, promoting healthier lives among college students," he said.

He said there was a great turnout at K-State, and the goal of the tour was right on track.

"It's the positive turnout among students," Tocar said. "It's great to have students come out and have a good time without drugs or alcohol."

Just weeks after confusion over ICAT availability for football games left students waiting for hours in long lines, some students were surprised to find that at the end of the basketball campout, their season basketball tickets were missing three games.

Tickets cut students' season by 3 games

JOEL WHITE
staff writer

As many students picked up their basketball season tickets this week, some were surprised to see that three games had already been punched off.

The Nov. 29 Thanksgiving break game against Mercer and the Dec. 20 and Jan. 3 winter break games against Virginia-Commonwealth and Missouri have already been punched off the tickets.

Carol Adolph, athletic ticket manager, said the three games were excluded because of last year's student outcry over the price of the tickets.

"Last year, the students complained for being charged for games that they couldn't go to," she said. "The three games were taken off the ticket so we could keep the cost down for the students."

The Department of Intercollegiate Athletics decided to make this year's price of a student season ticket $66, a decrease from last year's $96 season ticket. Individual game tickets can be purchased for $5 for each game that is excluded from the season ticket.

"Even if they buy the three games individually, it's going to be cheaper than last year," Adolph said.

Athletic Director Max Urick said the decision came last spring when the athletic department was putting the combo ticket together.

"We just took a look at the number of games that happened over the vacation break," Urick said. "We wanted to make it an option for the students to be able to buy them rather than having them pay if they couldn't go."

Josh Swartz, senior in education, said he likes the cheaper ticket.

"It's a good idea," he said. "We shouldn't have to pay for the games if we're not going to be here to see them."

Some student season-ticket holders were disgruntled because they were not notified of the three-game exclusion before they bought the ticket.

Allison Rushton, freshman in engineering, offered a solution to the public notification problem.

"They could have announced it at a football game," she said.

Matt Hempy, sophomore in political science, who is planning to attend the three games, said the athletic department shouldn't have excluded them from the ticket.

"I feel like they're taking advantage of the situation," he said. "Since we're buying season tickets, we might as well get the whole season."

Annual basketball camp out leaves Wildcat faithful in cold

JACOB JANSONIUS
staff reporter

They sat through the chilly night air and fought off bugs the entire time they were there.

Yet, after 24 hours of staking out territory in front of Ahearn Field House, the prize was finally claimed.

"I'm here for basketball tickets, and I'm not leaving until I get them," said Kris Waymire, freshman in kinesiology. "I'd stay here two or three days if I didn't have classes. It's quite an experience."

Edee Fisher, Athletic Ticket Sales Committee member, said everything went smoothly, but there were some different things to see.

"Everyone was pretty low-key and behaved. There were Christmas lights and even a toilet on wheels. People even brought big generators for TVs," Fisher said. "It's great to see people support K-State basketball by camping out."

About 20 groups participated in the camp out. The groups ranged in numbers from five to 60 people. More than 300 students sought ICAT tickets, and more than 150 students camped for general admission tickets.

Tamra Wilhelm, freshman in secondary education, said the trouble is worth it.

"We are the true fans. We sit outside and lay here in front of our tents when we could be doing something else. Plus, it's fun," Wilhelm said. "The people that didn't camp out will go to the games, but us campers will actually appreciate our seats. We'll be the ones screaming the loudest when it finally comes game time."

What's it like to stay the night as a camper?

Waymire said it is fun, but it has its drawbacks.

For instance, last night Waymire spent the night shivering under his sleeping bag and swatted bugs that continuously buzzed around his head.

"I woke up at least three times last night to swat an ant that was crawling on me. Then I shivered myself back to sleep," Waymire said.

Other campers didn't have it quite as rough. Several groups brought generators to power their Nintendos, televisions and stereos.

Whether they were sleeping under a tree branch or sleeping in the comfort of their own couches hauled to Ahearn, all the campers were awakened Tuesday morning by the women's basketball team passing out doughnuts.

"It was worth camping out just for that," Waymire said. "When she tapped on our tent and asked if I wanted one, I knew I had survived the night. Plus, it's not every day that I get breakfast in bed."

"I'm glad I did it, but I'm glad it's over," Wilhelm added. "If the basketball team does good this year, it will all be worthwhile. Hopefully, this is just a sample of the fun yet to come."

"WE ARE THE TRUE FANS. WE SIT OUTSIDE AND LAY HERE IN FRONT OF OUR TENTS WHEN WE COULD BE DOING SOMETHING ELSE."

THE K-STATE ROUNDUP

COMPILED BY SUN DEE MILLS

NEW BASKETBALL COACH

Brent Bargen has been promoted to the position of interim assistant basketball coach by head coach Tom Asbury for the 1997-98 season.

Bargen is in his third season as a member of the K-State basketball staff. He was promoted from the position of basketball operations manager to academic counselor before his most recent move within the program. He also handles a variety of other administrative duties.

Bargen played collegiate basketball at Doane College in Crete, Neb., where he helped his team to a conference title as a senior during the 1992-93 school year. Bargen averaged 12 points, six rebounds and three assists that year en route to earning all-conference honors.

He began his coaching career as an assistant at Dorchester High School in Nebraska in 1993 and then spent a season as an assistant coach at Nebraska Wesleyan University, where he helped the Plainsmen to the Sweet 16 of the NCAA Division III national tournament.

TICKETS REMAIN FOR VITALE EVENT

Tickets are still available for the Oct. 30 dinner featuring basketball analyst Dick Vitale. He will be the featured speaker at a dinner, with proceeds going to the Mike Ahearn Scholarship Fund. Tickets for the buffet meal are $50; tables of 10 are $500; and Slam Dunk tables that include nine guests, a K-State player and nine autographed photos of Vitale are $600.

A reception will begin at 5:15 p.m., followed by dinner at 6 p.m. at the Manhattan Holiday Inn and Holidome. Tickets can be purchased through the K-State Athletics Development Office at Bramlage Coliseum or by calling 532-7932.

TEXAS TECH GAME TO BE TELEVISED

The Nov. 1 football game between K-State and Texas Tech in Lubbock, Texas, has been selected to be regionally televised by the Big 12 Syndicated Network. Kickoff has been changed to 11:30 a.m.

The game can be seen on WIBW-TV (TCI channel 3) out of Topeka in Manhattan, and regionally on WDAF-TV in Kansas City and KWCH-TV in Wichita.

WOMEN'S GOLFERS IN THE HUNT

The K-State women's golf team trails only the University of Kansas with a two-round total of 640 at the Sunflower/Marilynn Smith Invitational in Andover, Kan. Leading the Wildcats is junior Jane Yi, who is tied for sixth (80-77=157), going into the final day of tournament play.

KU shot a two-round total of 632 (315-317) to lead the tournament. Wichita State's Natasha Ausderau has a 150 total to hold the individual lead.

Other K-State scores include: Edie Murdoch (81-77=158, ninth), Ann Slater (83-77=160, 11th), Mitzi Taylor (83-82=165, T-17th) and Carrie Chambers (85-87=172, T-32nd). K-State's Traci Benninga is competing as an individual and is in 31st place (88-83-171).

The final round of the tournament, of which are hosts K-State and Wichita State at the 5,962-yard, par 71 Terradyne Hotel Resort and Golf Club, was played Tuesday.

CREW FINISHES 31ST IN BOSTON

The K-State women's rowing team finished 31st of 50 boats in the Championship Eights race Sunday at the prestigious Head of the Charles regatta, in Boston, Mass. The Cats' lone entry finished with a time of 17 minutes, 23.97 seconds. Rowing Canada took first place with a time of 15:44.77.

The Cats finished ahead of Big 12 participants Colorado, a club team, and Kansas.

K-State is back on the water this weekend at the Head of the Iowa regatta, to be Saturday and Sunday in Des Moines, Iowa.

VOLLEYBALL TEAM TO APPEAR ON TV

K-State's home volleyball matchup with the Texas Longhorns on Saturday will be broadcast by FOX Sports Net, marking the second appearance on that network by the Cats this season. The game will be aired on a tape-delayed basis on Sunday. Fox Sports Rocky Mountain (TCI Channel 38) is the regional Fox Sports Net affiliate.

The Cats, working on a five-match winning streak, also play Texas A&M at 7 p.m. Friday at Ahearn Field House.

MEN'S GOLF FINISHING FALL SCHEDULE

K-State's men's golf team is finishing the fall portion of its schedule this week at the Louisiana Tech Intercollegiate in Calhoun, La.

Brant Benninga followed up a first-round 75 with a career-low one-under-par 71 to move into a third-place tie after Monday's second round. His previous best was a 72, which he achieved last season at the Red Raider Invitational in Lubbock, Texas.

As a team, K-State shot a 599 (+23) after the first two rounds. The Cats are in third place out of 14 teams, nine shots off the lead held by Arkansas State.

Oklahoma Sooners' fans bitter at thought of losing 5th straight to team it once dominated

VIEWPOINT

SUN DEE MILLS

SUN DEE MILLS is a senior in electronic journalism. You can send your e-mail comments to Sun Dee at sundee@ksu.edu.

Bitter hotline, Sooners speaking. How can we help you?

Well, first of all, the Sooners are helping the Wildcats with their pocketbooks. The last line I saw on this game said K-State was a seven-and-a-half point favorite. Sources close to me and Las Vegas tell me this is easy money. Why?

The Cats are living for the present and looking for their fifth win over Oklahoma. National perspective, the Sooners and their fans just can't shake the past.

Oklahoma has a deep-seeded history in college football. Most college football fans recall the successes by the Sooners' all-time winningest coach Barry Switzer, now with those pesky Dallas Cowboys.

During Switzer's tenure, from 1973-88, he took Oklahoma to three national championships, 12 Big 8 Conference championships and eight different bowl games in 13 appearances.

The Sooners were also the first team ever to capture a back-to-back national championship more than once.

So it is easy to see how embittered fans can get when a program known for consistent success doesn't deliver.

Sooners coach John Blake, who, when he took over the coaching position in 1996, was the youngest head coach in Division I-A college football, is getting back to the basics in Norman.

Last weekend against Baylor, he benched quarterback Justin Fuente, who had started in the five games prior. In went option man Eric Moore, who, in his second start of the season, rushed 14 times for 141 yards and ran for an 80-yard touchdown.

Blake said he wanted to go back to the option, something Sooner football is known for. As an assistant at Oklahoma, Switzer suggested trying the wishbone offense, from which the triple option is often run. This offensive switch led to Oklahoma's football dynasty of the 1970s and later 1980s.

"We're going to run the option, because that's part of my heritage," Blake told the Associated Press after the Baylor game. He played for Switzer from 1979-82.

"We have the right personnel to do it. Eric has done a good job of giving us a chance to run the option."

The Sooners needed to do something. The team is now 3-4, 1-2 in the Big 12. Their first loss in the Pigskin Classic to Northwestern's Wildcats was a big one, 24-0, and will undoubtedly be repeated this weekend by a different set of Wildcats.

Oklahoma's wins have all come at home, all close games within two points or less. Oh, wait. I forgot the Louisville victory, when the Sooners dominated 35-14.

That's an important one, because Louisville is 1-5, with its one win coming in versus a winless Illinois.

Not.

It's time for Oklahoma to change something, but no change will stop the "Lynch Mob." K-State's defense, especially in the rush department, came into its own against Texas A&M last weekend. If three different backs named DeMond Parker had three balls, not one would make it through the "Mob" and get near the end zone.

"We're riding high," junior linebacker Travis Ochs said Tuesday. Ochs recalled letting the Sooners back into the game in the fourth quarter last year and said, "Our plan is not to do that this year."

Oklahoma will be hungry for their fourth home win. This battle with the Sooners has become heated, and last season the Cats became the fourth team to win four straight games against the Sooners.

"Oklahoma is a perennial power in football," defensive end Joe Bob Clements said. "We've been like the little stepbrother."

On a tip, I cruised the Big 12 web site, which can be found at www.gobig12.com. Wow, was there some bitterness to be found.

Some of the more amusing things I found there said how the Aggies were overrated and really don't have a vaunted rushing attack. I personally can't wait until Nov. 15, when the Aggies roll into Norman and roll all over the middle-of-the-road Sooners' rushing defense.

There were other mean-spirited, uncalled-for comments that aren't fit to print on paper, so I won't go there. But the gist of it is this:

Oklahoma fans want this win, because the idea of losing five in a row to a team the Sooners beat 21 times in a row between 1971-92 makes their maroon blood boil.

"I think it's just the rise of K-State football," Clements said. "Maybe they're not taking it very well."

I'll say. They can't face the reality that their once-excellent football program has a long way to go before it reaches that level of excellence again.

Blake is a good coach with credible experience. He could be the guy to get the Sooners up there again.

But not this year. And definitely not against the Cats this weekend.

My prediction: Cats 41, Sooners 18.

(And pay no attention to the whole Braves — Orioles prediction. My swamie was having a bad hair day.)

Adventures in Shanghai

City filled with crowds, skyscrapers, neon signs

KEVYN JACOBS,
special to the collegian

Travelogue

We arrived in Shanghai, China, in the wee hours of the morning on Oct. 4, so I was asleep when the ship docked. That was a shame because I always enjoy standing on deck and watching our approach to a new city.

I don't know what I expected of my first glimpse of China, but what I saw when I looked out my window wasn't anything even close to what I imagined. There, directly across the Huangpo River, was this huge, futuristic-looking structure that would have been at home in "Buck Rogers in the 25th Century." It turned out to be the Pearl of the Orient TV tower, Shanghai's most recognizable landmark and the tallest structure in Asia. I've never seen anything quite like it, except, perhaps, in a Jetson's cartoon.

The rest of the city's skyline was not at all what I expected. Skyscrapers are going up everywhere. The entire city seems to be one giant construction area. I've never seen so much construction in my life.

The next thing to shock me was the number of huge neon advertising signs that peppered the skyline: Sprite, Phillips, Volkswagen, Fuji Film. China is definitely open for business, and the international corporations are taking advantage of it. It seems the Chinese government has taken a long, hard look at Hong Kong and seen what the Chinese people were capable of under a free-market system. So they've opened the Chinese market, and a phenomenal amount of foreign capital has started flowing into China, hence all the construction.

But getting off the boat, I found the old China still there. Between the shiny, glass-and-steel corporate office buildings are polluted, crowded streets, lined with dingy, decaying buildings built under 40 years of communism. This is the old Shanghai. It is being eradicated by the city's incredible new growth, but it's definitely still there.

Probably the most unpleasant thing about Shanghai is the smell. The smog is extreme, and the rivers stink like a cesspool, clogged with the raw sewage and trash of a billion people. Environmental concern is one area in which Shanghai has a long way to go.

The exchange rate of 8 yuan to the dollar makes almost everything here cheap. I spent about $150 in five days in Shanghai — including food, souvenirs, postage back to the states, taxi rides and admission fees to tourist sites. In Japan I spent close to $100 a day.

Soon after we docked in Shanghai, close to two-thirds of the shipboard community boarded buses to catch a flight to Beijing. The optional trip to China's capital was pretty expensive, so some students, like myself, opted to spend our whole time in Shanghai. We called ourselves "The Shangolition," and we had the ship pretty much to ourselves for several days. It was nice to focus and reflect on Shanghai without having to contend with the crowds on-ship. There were enough crowds to contend with in the city.

And crowds there certainly were. With a population of more than 1.3 billion, China is renowned for its population problems. It kind of puts you in awe of China to think that one person out of every five on this planet is Chinese.

On my first day in Shanghai I took a guided tour of the city, visiting the Yu Yuan gardens, the famous Jade Buddha temple and the government-operated "Friendship Store," where foreigners are invited to buy all sorts of Chinese and imported products at reasonable prices. I also went to an acrobatics show, which turned out to be one of the best parts of my visit. The Chinese have a reputation for producing fantastic acrobats, and this was certainly the case: jugglers, tumblers, contortionists and balancing acts all seem to be done with incredible ease.

Right next door to the acrobatics show was Shanghai's own Hard Rock Cafe. A sizable number of Semester at Sea students went to Hard Rock while we were there, some every night. They preferred the American-style food and atmosphere to urban Chinese places, and the arguments got heated when the students who came to China to experience China accused the students who went to Hard Rock of having come on the trip just to party. "Why come to China," the argument went, "if all you're going to do is hang out at the American party places?"

Needless to say, the issue was not resolved, and the student life staff had to tell everyone to drop the issue and stop harassing those who feel compelled to keep going to American-style establishments. So much for harmony among college students.

On Sunday morning, I made a trip to the People's Park to what is called "English Corner." This is a small part of the park where Chinese people practice their English. They were, of course, delighted to have a native speaker's help, and I met some wonderful people in the process.

I met a university student named Gu Ming. Gu is studying electrical engineering at Shanghai Jiao Tong University, and he spoke very good English. We had some interests in common, and we ended up spending the whole day together, so he had someone to speak English with and I had a native guide. He took me to lunch at a delightful little hole-in-the-wall noodle shop run by Chinese Muslims from Lan Zhou province, showed me around his university and let me check my e-mail at his university's computer center. He also introduced me to his girlfriend. The three of us had dinner together at a traditional Chinese dumpling restaurant, and I promised to keep in touch with him. I had made a friend in Shanghai.

The next day I took a special tour titled "Tasting the Life of a Typical Shanghai Citizen," one of the trips sponsored by Semester at Sea. We visited an open-air fish and vegetable market, a grocery store, a kindergarten and a community center.

We were invited to visit a "typical" family in their home and have a meal. That was pretty neat. Mr. Min and most of his family spoke no English, but their niece, a college student, did. So we talked with her. Everyone else just nodded and smiled and said "Hao chr," which means delicious food, and it was.

The following day, I went with a group to a local maternity hospital to learn about family planning in China. With one-fifth of the world population to feed, China is big on birth control. Laws for city dwellers are very strict — only one child is allowed per family. Women who become pregnant with a second child are strongly encouraged to get abortions, and if you violate the one-child law, you face stiff fines, ostracism and possibly even losing your job.

To most Westerners accustomed to total reproductive freedom, this might seem rather harsh, but to me it is the most logical and humane approach for the Chinese. You have to imagine what it would be like if everyone had the freedom to have multiple children and this caused those children to starve to death. From that perspective, it is far better to have only one child who flourishes than have multiple children who suffer. But it always gives me pause to look at the people of Shanghai and realize almost none of them have siblings.

My last day in Shanghai turned out to be a bit of a disaster when I learned the hard way that China is not designed with very tall people in mind. At 2 meters tall (6 feet 7 inches), I certainly stand out in a crowd. While walking back to the ship, I blindly walked into a window air conditioner hanging above the sidewalk. The collision caused a deep gash in my scalp, which bled profusely.

When I got back to the ship, leaving a substantial trail of blood behind me, the nurse on duty sutured up my head — seven stitches in all. Good thing I had gotten my tetanus shot at Lafene Health Center on campus shortly before I left.

I spent the rest of the day on ship, recuperating, writing postcards and regaling the students returning from Beijing with stories of how I was attacked by an evil Chinese air conditioner.

Seeing China in the midst of such a huge transition was fascinating. I think I would like to return here in 10 or 20 years to see how much it will change. I hope the changes will be for the best.

"If we impose this fee, we're not really considering those people who are more worried about affording education than getting a football ticket," he said.

Truax said although students who couldn't afford the fee or don't attend the games are a minority, their arguments against the fee should still be heard.

"We should really be considering the minority group in this issue," Truax said. "It is the minority group, probably, that will not be able to pay the privilege fee or not be able to afford to go to football games. But I think we should consider their case as well."

Bret Glendening, agriculture student senator and Privilege Fee Committee member, said students should help pay for the expansion, probably through a fee.

"It's only fair that students help pick up some of the tab on it. Whether it's one plan or the other doesn't matter to me, but I think we should help pay for the expansion," he said.

Glendening said informing students about options should help generate support for the creation of a new privilege fee.

"If the message gets out, I think a lot of students would be in favor or it, especially when they realize it's for the betterment of the football program and the university as a whole," Glendening said.

Woman's standoff becomes symbol for anti-government groups

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ROBY, Ill. — To neighbors, 51-year-old Shirley Ann Allen was the harmless loner who sometimes talked of spies in helicopters or sprang from ditches to surprise people.

Outside this rural community, she was unknown.

That was before Allen took up her shotgun and threatened sheriff's deputies who were sent to take her away for a court-ordered psychiatric exam.

In a standoff that has gone on for a month now, she has fended off a tear gas attack by slathering petroleum jelly on her face, withstood bean bag bullets by wearing heavy layers of clothing and ignored the Barry Manilow songs blared through loudspeakers.

Now, the woman is in the national spotlight, the darling of right-wing groups who feel she is the latest example — after Ruby Ridge and Waco — of innocent civilians being bullied by overzealous law enforcement.

Radio talk hosts across the nation have used the case to engage callers in a debate about property rights, mental health laws and the right to bear arms.

"The American people are not going to take this lying down," said Thomas Wayne, a spokesman for a Michigan-based group.

Wayne said the woman's cause is compelling, because she has not been charged with any crime, yet must live under 24-hour surveillance of state police.

The standoff began with the court order obtained by Allen's family, who had begun to worry about her increasingly bizarre behavior and depression since her husband died of cancer in 1989.

Allen holed up in her home in Roby, about 20 miles southeast of Springfield, after telling sheriff's deputies and her brother to get off her property.

She fired at officers twice during the early days of the standoff, with no injuries.

The second shotgun blast came after troopers pummeled her in the chest with bean bag bullets.

When deputies tried to drive her out with tear gas, she stuck her head under running water and used the petroleum jelly to prevent her pores from absorbing the gas.

Weary police speculate that the avid canner has enough food in her cupboards to last several more weeks.

Allen's family issued a statement last week expressing support for police and expressing their desire to get help for whole benefits from participation by everyone.

"There's probably some people here who don't use Lafene, but there's still a student fee to support it for everybody. As a result, there's a higher quality of services provided."

Football coach Bill Snyder said students who don't have the opportunity to use the stadium now could use it under the new plan because more seats will be created.

"We're hoping that the expansion would benefit the university as a whole, and especially the student body. We want to get all the students we can get in here. They're great in the way they respond, but we can't get them all in here," Snyder said. "Hopefully, there are several thousand out there that want to get in here. This would allow them that opportunity."

Snyder said although students might not think they will benefit from a stadium expansion, the overall effect would help the university.

"It's like a building for the school of architecture. Not everyone is into architecture, but it's kind of a team-type of thing. We all need to help each other out," Snyder said. "The football team doesn't need to be the recipient of everything on this campus, but it's important to work together as a student body and as a community."

Kim Wiggans, graduate student in Spanish literature, said she supports the idea of stadium expansion but also thinks other campus priorities should be addressed by privilege fees; specifically, a recent 30-percent cut in periodical subscriptions at Hale Library has affected research capabilities, she said. The creation of a periodical fee has been proposed, and Wiggans said she would support that improvement first.

"I don't really mind paying a privilege fee for stadium expansion," she said. "But I think if it's going to be important to improve the football stadium, then there needs to be equal importance placed to improve the quality of the library, as well. The library is just as important as the football stadium, if not more."

Urick said he realizes the importance of academics.

"You'll never catch me talking for athletics and against academics," he said. Urick said stadium expansion shouldn't be overlooked for library needs, and both are important.

"My counsel and guidance to students would be to vote 'yes' for both," Urick said. "They are both very real needs. They're legitimate and they have been identified."

Though the creation of fees for stadium expansion and library periodicals would boost K-State's student fees, Urick said the cost would be worth it.

"I sincerely feel for students who feel a financial pinch. No one likes to pay more," Urick said. "I don't like to pay more for a loaf of bread at the store or a gallon of gas at the filling station, but I do know that the cost of operation and the cost of living go up. If I want to continue to enjoy those things, I have to pay more."

DECISION

"Can the city afford to go along with a development like this?" he asked. In response to his own question, Reitz explained that if a development goes into the Northview neighborhood, it must be ready to deal with the water problem.

"I just don't think we're ready for this yet," he said.

After the rest of the commission spoke about the proposal with comments mirroring Reitz's, it was put to a vote.

Mayor Bruce Snead called for the commission's decision. With a vote of 5-0 the proposed annexation of Cohen-Esrey's development was deemed unfavorable.

As Snead rapped the gavel, giving the final decision, applause broke out in the lecture hall and a shout of "Thank you!" was heard from a member of the public.

With that, Snead said further discussion on the proposed annexation was now moot.

Boston University sues term-paper companies

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON — Need a report on McCarthyism? That'll be $54. A 13-page explanation of moral luck is $65 — ethical theory costs a bit more.

Both reports are advertised on the World Wide Web pages of companies sued in federal court Monday by Boston University, which accuses them of selling term papers over the Internet to a law clerk posing as a student.

The lawsuit alleges wire fraud, mail fraud and racketeering, and specifically charges eight companies in seven states with breaking a Massachusetts law that prohibits the sale of term papers. The school said it was the first federal lawsuit brought by a university about the online sale of term papers.

The companies said the documents are made available for research only, not to be submitted as original material. Most have disclaimers to that effect on their Web sites and said they also send a written warning with the materials they sell.

But BU general counsel Bob Smith called the disclaimers ineffective and said other advertising shows that the companies knew these papers were intended to be submitted for grades and credit.

Term papers sold to BU were neatly printed and ready to be turned in, Smith said. One company, which was not identified, offered to put the student's name, professor's name and course number on the cover sheet.

Smith said BU officials were not aware of any student submitting a term paper purchased online. The lawsuit seeks a court order barring the companies from doing business in Massachusetts, unspecified damages and the seizure of all the term papers, theses or research documents they have for sale.

One company official said it was an issue of First Amendment rights.

"It's like if you were given 'War and Peace' and use the Cliffs Notes," said Robert Vitrano, owner of Professor Abe Korn's Term Paper, School and Business Help Line, one of the defendants. "There's nothing wrong with that."

Cliffs Notes, published by a Lincoln, Neb., company, summarize works of literature. They were banned recently at Villanova University near Philadelphia.

Like other term paper providers, Vitrano said he sends his customers a warning that they shouldn't submit the work as their own.

"Everyone that calls me, I tell them if they're going to hand it in as their own work that I don't want them as a customer," he said.

The other companies named were A-Plus Termpapers of Jersey City, N.J.; A-1 Termpapers of West Chester, Pa.; High-Performance Papers of Milwaukee; Research Assistance of Los Angeles; The Paper Store Enterprises Inc. of Jackson, N.J.; Paper Shack of Shreveport, La; and paperz.com of San Antonio. They did not return calls or declined to comment Monday.

A-1 offers 20,000 term papers at a range of prices, including the McCarthyism report. Custom documents cost up to $35 a page, plus shipping.

At the Web site of paperz.com, where browsers can find the paper on moral luck, there is the following disclaimer:

"While the Gray Master Co. does not condone the substitution of its products for original research and hard work, we trust our customers to make their own responsible decisions about the proper academic use of our products."

her. Otherwise, they've been quiet.

But as the standoff drags on, sympathies in Allen's wooded neighborhood have shifted decidedly in her favor.

Last week, about 150 protesters gathered in the county seat to demand police leave Allen alone.

Many said it was inhumane for troopers to cut off her water and power, particularly as temperatures dropped near freezing.

A woman was arrested after she sneaked past police barriers and tried to sprint to Allen's door with a bag of groceries.

"It's a surreal experience," Shellie Jacobs, one of Allen's neighbors, said.

Jacobs, like residents in about a dozen other houses in the wooded area, must check in with troopers who have set up roadblocks at the entrances to the neighborhood. She must get clearance for visitors, and only recently had her family's mail and garbage service restored.

"The other day, my 4-year-old said, 'Mommy, when are the policemen going to be out of our yard?'" Jacobs said.

That's a question State Police Director Terrance Gainer gets asked almost daily. He insists that the dozens of troopers and hidden tactical agents who rotate duty on the 24-hour watch — at a cost to the state of almost $500,000 so far — will stay at it until the standoff ends.

Gainer conceded that the waiting game and the criticism are frustrating. But he said mental health experts have assured him that this is the way to bring the standoff to a peaceful end.

"We are not in this woman's face," Gainer said. "We are there for this woman's protection and for the protection of her neighbors."

Boeing business boom means bust

BUSY BOEING TURNS AWAY BILLIONS IN ORDERS

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SEATTLE — Business is so good at the Boeing Co. that it's losing money.

The world's largest manufacturer of commercial jets is so swamped with orders — and is so far behind — that it will cost the company $2.6 billion in the coming year.

Late aircraft deliveries, a lack of skilled labor, parts shortages and a snarled assembly line have resulted from an unprecedented increase in production. The problems will result in a rare loss for the third quarter and will hurt earnings into next year, the company said Wednesday.

"We knew that we were going to have significant problems in ramping up our production," Boeing spokesman Paul Binder said.

The problems will cost Boeing about $1.6 billion before taxes in the third quarter ended Sept. 30, said Phil Condit, chairman and chief executive. Even if Boeing's production recovery plan works, he added, additional disruptions will add $1 billion in costs through 1998.

The unexpected size of the loss sent Boeing's stock tumbling more than 7 percent, or by $4 a share, to $50 Wednesday afternoon on the New York Stock Exchange, dragging down the Dow Jones industrial average.

Boeing, which will announce its earnings on Friday, will experience only its third quarterly loss in the past 25 years. A year ago, it earned $254 million in the period.

In contrast with the current troubles, the last loss came two years ago as Boeing was paying for an early retirement program to cut employment by 12,000 employees.

Blindsided by the sudden turnaround in orders, Boeing has hired 32,000 people in the past one and a half years. It plans to hire more.

Boeing said two weeks ago it would halt new production of 747-400 jetliners for a month and slow

Resolution urges fraternities to ban alcohol in houses

AMY BICKEL
staff reporter

The members of the National Panhellenic Conference announced a resolution passed Saturday at their annual meeting that urges fraternities on campuses across the nation to ban alcohol from their residences.

NPC is an umbrella organization for 26 national sororities, including 11 represented at K-State. These sororities operate under a substance-free policy.

A study by the Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse at Columbia University found alcohol is a factor in 40 percent of all academic problems and 28 percent of dropouts.

Three fraternities, Phi Delta Theta, Sigma Nu and Phi Gamma Delta, voted to ban alcoholic beverages from their campus residences by the year 2000.

"Our responsibility extends beyond our houses," Lissa Bradford, chairman of NPC, said. "Our resolution supports the efforts of several national fraternities to ban alcohol from their houses and refocus these men on a living experience centered around friendship, leadership and education."

With three houses banning alcohol from residences, Bradford said she thought the movement should be a continuing trend.

The NPC is encouraging campus Panhellenic Councils to support the resolution and encourage chapters to participate in functions with fraternities in a safer, substance-free environment.

"This isn't an anti-drinking resolution," she said. "We're just promoting leadership and high ideals for men and women in these organizations. This is a beginning step in that direction."

Barb Robel, Greek Affairs adviser, said the initial decision for K-State substance-free housing was up to the fraternities.

"While I applaud this resolution, it's not much of an impact on how fraternities choose to go about this issue," Robel said.

She said it was too early to tell what results will come from the resolution.

"We are just laying the groundwork

Agronomy student relies on background in dairy farming to pay for tuition bills

A clock reads 3:30 a.m. The alarm goes off. Time to get up and get at it. Maybe grab a cup of coffee or a pop to keep awake.

While most K-State students are in bed at this time, Ryan Reiff, junior in agronomy, works on a dairy farm.

Reiff is a milker at the K-State Dairy Unit.

Twice a week he gets up at early hours or milks late into the night to help pay his college tuition. Besides milking, he works a couple of days a week feeding the cattle. On Saturdays, he farms for a neighbor in his hometown of Abilene, rounding out 25-30 hours of work a week.

"It's pretty repetitious," Reiff said. "I always enjoy doing it — like setting up the barn for operation — just like a piece of machinery."

This job wasn't Reiff's first time to milk a cow. He milked during high school to earn extra money.

"While I was in high school, my dad farmed and drove a school bus on the side. He couldn't afford to give me an allowance for the work I did, so I got a job at a dairy, and I liked it," Reiff said.

He used his high school job in FFA in the Supervised Occupational Educational Program. The program teaches students to keep records on what they did and experiences in agriculture. Reiff worked 18 hours a week at a dairy plus 10-15 hours on weekends doing farm labor.

Reiff worked in Dickinson County until about a year ago when one of his friends who worked at the dairy unit told him about the job.

"He convinced them that I'd be good help," Reiff said.

The Dairy Unit has about 200 cows. Reiff and another worker milk until 10 a.m. They check for cows in heat and take care of sick cattle. He also feeds calves.

But the Dairy Unit isn't like other dairy farms. It counts on students for help.

"There's always people visiting and classes being held out there," Reiff said. "It's interesting being around the cows. They're more used to people than cows in a normal dairy would be."

Although he likes his job, the long hours wear him down. He balances his work schedule while taking 17 hours this semester and participating in functions with his fraternity, Alpha Gamma Rho.

"Sometimes I get to doing too much — I don't always say 'no,'" Reiff said. "Especially when helping with fall harvest or spring planting. One night while milking, I opened a gate and sent 24 head of cattle all over the dairy. You get worn out. That's typical farming."

Unlike other jobs, the dairy barn isn't always predictable. The cattle need to be milked even if it's below zero outside.

The temperature in the milk barn can be almost a 50-degree jump from the outside air.

"I've heard stories of people passing out it was such a switch," Reiff said. "Winters are interesting. You

CONDOM RECALL

Ansell Personal Products recalled batches of three brands of its condoms after discovering that some might break.

Some 57 million condoms from the Lifestyles, Prime and Contempo brands were subject to the recall, said the Food and Drug Administration.

"That doesn't mean there are 57 million bad condoms," emphasized FDA spokeswoman Sharon Snider.

But when New Jersey-based Ansell discovered that some condoms could deteriorate before their expiration dates, it couldn't predict exactly which batches were at risk. So to be safe, it recalled every variety in question, Snider said.

The FDA urged consumers to check their condoms to ensure they had not already bought the recalled brands.

Consumers may call (800) 883-3434 between 8 a.m. and 5 p.m. for more information.

Software allows students to attend class using Web

CATHY BACH
staff reporter

The College of Education is using Web Crossing to offer Seminar in Leadership, a World Wide Web-based class, to graduate students this semester.

Web Crossing, software created by Lundeen and Associates based in Alameda, Calif., allows users to have discussions from both local and international locations.

This software allows students to post messages that other classmates can read or respond to at any time.

Tweed Ross, director of Technology Services for the College of Education, said the software allows his students to work on flexible schedules.

"It creates a classroom environment where we can have real discussions in asynchronous situations," Ross said.

To participate, students go to the College of Education's home page, link to Ross' page, find the syllabus with the link to FAE 886 and connect with the page. Then they type in their name and password to discuss the assigned reading with Ross.

Ross said normally students don't give detailed responses quickly when communicating with listservs or in situations when face-to-face contact has not been made between participants. He said students in this class seem to be comfortable with the software and gave long, detailed and responsive messages soon after their initial discussions.

Kathy Nielson, graduate student in advanced education, said there are many advantages to taking the class over the Internet. She said being an extension agent in Lincoln County and a mother to three children often means her time for reading is limited. She said classes like this one are helpful because they fit into her hectic lifestyle.

"That's the nice part of this class," Nielson said. "I can get up and read or do the chat business before work or late at night when I have the time."

Dave Howey, graduate student in education, said as a military officer instructor at Fort Leavenworth he wanted to see how K-State would use the

3 men arrested in $1 million drug bust in western Kansas

GARDEN CITY, Kan. — Three Garden City men are in custody pending federal drug charges, after local and federal authorities seized drugs and property they valued at more than $1 million.

The haul included 745 pounds of marijuana, more than one pound of cocaine and 30 grams of methamphetamine, police Capt. Stan Wojdylak said.

Three men, whose names were not released, were arrested Friday after a six-week investigation that included city police, Finney County sheriff's officers and the federal Drug Enforcement Agency.

Authorities also confiscated four vehicles, two handguns and $13,000 in cash, Wojdylak said.

Jury considers whether off-duty officer was justified in shooting

WHITE PLAINS, N.Y. — A jury began Wednesday considering the fate of a police officer who, while off duty, shot and killed a man who grabbed a bat during a dispute over a parking space.

The defense argued Tuesday that New York City Officer Richard D. DiGuglielmo's response was justified, but prosecutors said he was blinded by rage when he shot Charles Campbell three times.

DiGuglielmo, 32, is charged with murder and, if convicted, could be sentenced to 25 years to life in prison.

Campbell was shot Oct. 3, 1996, outside the DiGuglielmo's family deli in Dobbs Ferry. He had parked in the patrons-only lot before going across the street for pizza.

The officer's father put a no-parking sticker on Campbell's Corvette and a fight broke out. Campbell pulled a bat from the car, hit the father in the knee and was shot three times by the son, prosecutors contend.

Government forces schools to lift ban on recruiters by cutting aid

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Kenyon College had little to lose when it closed its campus to military recruiters in 1992 to protest Pentagon rules barring homosexuals from the armed forces.

The small, prestigious liberal arts college in Gambier, Ohio, was involved in no Pentagon research projects, so it felt no pinch when Congress voted in 1994 to deny military grants and contracts to colleges that barred recruiters.

Recruiting sergeants are back now, however, at Kenyon and many other campuses that once barred them. Congress quietly raised the ante last year for schools that still kept out the recruiters: they could lose all their federal student aid.

Melissa Kravetz, 19, co-president of a Kenyon student group called Allied Sexual Orientations, called it blackmail but doesn't fault the college for reversing its stand.

Indiana fraternity suspended for racially offensive scavenger hunt

BLOOMINGTON, Ind. — A fraternity begged for a r'iance to explain after it was suspended and threatened with expulsion by Indiana University for sending pledges on a racially and ethnically offensive scavenger hunt.

A campus judiciary panel should complete its review of Zeta Beta Tau's actions within 10 days, university chancellor Kenneth Gros Louis said.

The chapter was suspended by the national fraternity after it sent pledges on a scavenger hunt to find photos of "2 chicks kissing (less clothes, more credit)," a midget and "any funny-lookin' Mexican."

Zeta Beta Tau's list "really offended many groups on campus," Gros Louis said. "It offended women, blacks, gays and lesbians. It offended the majority culture."

The list surfaced when police arrested nine pledges last week on charges of stealing a street sign, one of 22 items on the scavenger list.

THE K-STATE GREEK population nearly filled McCain Auditiorium on Wednesday night to listen to Will Keim speak at an all-greek chapter meeting. Keim spoke about academics, sexual responsibility, hazing, alcohol and drugs relating to greek life.

All-greek chapter

K-STATE GREEKS GATHER FOR NATIONAL SPEAKER

ANGELA BUCCIGROSSI
staff reporter

Greek students got a chance to realize their opportunities and ways they could improve their lives at last nights' all-greek chapter meeting.

"How great could you be, if you really began to think of yourself and your potential?" Will Keim, motivational guest lecturer, asked.

Keim, who has a doctorate in education, spoke for the Interfraternity Council and the Panhellenic Council's first all greek chapter. He discussed ways they could improve themselves and the greek community.

"Male and female, black and white greeks – we're in this together. We're only as strong as our weakest chapter on this campus. We have to take care of each other," Keim said.

With the increase of alcohol-related deaths, Keim said greek chapters all over the country are in danger of being eliminated and the only way to protect greek organizations is to practice their standards.

"I want you to do what you said you would do the night you were initiated. I want you new pledges, and associate members and anybody interested, to do what you said you would do. What the fraternities and sororities stand for," he said.

"We've got to preserve it. We've got to strengthen it. We've got to grow it, but we can't do it with people sitting on their butts," Keim said.

Keim said there were 10 things greeks could do to improve as individuals and as greek communities.

Academics was the first thing students have to be concerned with in order to succeed as students and greek membesr. Go to class and take notes, he said.

"You need to study. Here's how to study. Go to the library during the day between classes. I want you to sit in the front row and take notes. I want you to take your notes home every day and re-copy them in outline form," he said.

Along with studying, students need to focus on being community servants, working with other organizations on campus and upholding their personal character.

"I want you to be men and women of character. Say what you mean and do what you say and when you don't, admit it," he said.

Students need to be sexually responsible, stop hazing and be independent of drugs and alcohol, Keim said.

"It's one of the big differences between being a student when I was in school and now, is we could not kill ourselves with sex," he said.

With the danger of pregnancy and sexually transmitted diseases, students are at high risk. The only way to be safe is to be responsible, he said.

Along with being a responsible person, students also need to thank their parents for their support and take time for exercise and contemplation or prayer, he said.

The 10th and final thing all students should remember to do is try to be their best, he said. Only you will know if you did your best and you're the one who will have to live with it, Keim said.

Barb Robel, Greek Affairs adviser, said the presentation was a step beyond the traditional Greek 101 for new members.

"It's just an extension of Greek 101. We wanted to give everyone a chance to hear his presentation because he's such a dynamic speaker," she said.

The gathering was also developed to bring the greek houses together.

"I think it's really great for everyone to come together. I'd like to try and do it again," Jennifer Gorman, Panhellenic president, said.

Proposal could raise student health premiums

RUSSELL FORTMEYER

If the state administration department's proposal for state-offered student health insurance is authorized, premiums could rise for all carriers of K-State's student health insurance plan.

The Student Health Advisory Committee met Wednesday to discuss next Tuesday's Festival of Health in the K-State Student Union, upcoming privilege fee concerns, and to learn more about the state proposal for student health insurance.

Lannie Zweimiller, director of Lafene Health Center, updated the committee on the state proposal to offer student health, which would be done through an administrative regulation with no legislative approval necessary.

The insurance plan was proposed after graduate student assistants at the University of Kansas unionized and demanded to be covered by state health insurance.

Zweimiller said there aren't too many specifics about the possible plan available at this point.

"It appears it is going forward," Zweimiller said. "We are looking at finding out exactly what the components of that plan would be."

The potentially higher premiums are owed the fragmentation of the health insurance population, Zweimiller said.

For example, K-State receives a lower rate on insurance now, thanks in part to the large number of students who take the insurance.

If a percentage of those students were to take the state's proposed plan instead, it would lower the total group amount for both plans and could raise premiums on both sides.

"That's a concern we have. I don't know if it's real or not," Zweimiller said.

Another issue Zweimiller has with the state plan is that it would take the students out of the decision process. Currently, SHAC helps to formulate the health insurance offered by Lafene based on student needs.

A state-offered plan would be set at the state level.

"Now students are involved in designing the plan," Zweimiller said. "If you remove that to another level, you're potentially removing that student involvement."

Lafene also faces preparing for a privilege fee review this year. The student fee pays for operating costs, equipment purchases and salaries.

At SHAC's Nov. 5 meeting, its fee review subcommittee will present a proposed fee package to the entire SHAC body for review.

Passage of the fee proposal will occur at the Nov. 12 SHAC meeting. After passage within SHAC, the fee will proceed to the Student Senate Privilege Fee Committee.

In addition, Julie Tarara, SHAC chair, requested volunteers to help with next week's Festival of Health. The Festival of Health, where Lafene's services will set up in Union Courtyard, will occur from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. Tuesday.

Need more info?
The Student Health Advisory Committee will meet next at 4:15 p.m. on Nov. 5 in the Lafene Health Center conference room.

RCPD arrests ex-Haymaker resident for possession of drugs with intent to sell in August incident

ANDREA COREY
senior staff writer

A man who might be a K-State student was arrested Wednesday morning for possession with intent to sell LSD.

Lt. Rodney Jager of the Riley County Police Department said Tobias M. Hathorn was arrested at 10:32 a.m. Wednesday, after an incident on Aug. 31 that led to a criminal investigation.

The original incident involved a report to the RCPD that a man had jumped through glass and was found running naked through the streets near Ninth and Kearney streets.

Jager said the man was found to be under the influence of drugs. Because Jager was not sure whether the man had been arrested, he wouldn't release his name, but would say the man was not Hathorn.

Jager said the incident launched a criminal investigation by RCPD. Facts from the investigation were collected and forwarded to the Riley County attorney's office. A judge signed a warrant for Hathorn's arrest and set the bond at $5,000.

Hathorn posted bond Wednesday afternoon and was released.

Hathorn was a resident of Haymaker Hall last year and the early part of this year, Todd Clark, residence life coordinator for Haymaker Hall, said.

Clark said Hathorn was evicted from his room at Haymaker because he was suspected to be in possession of a controlled substance, though he said he couldn't remember the exact date it happened.

"In the contract it states that anyone convicted or accused of a crime, that their contract can fall under review," Clark said.

"We don't meddle with prosecution, our burden of proof is a preponderance of evidence."

Clark said he thought Hathorn was definitely affected by the situation and that he had been working with Hathorn.

"I've been working with him on the judicial side and the counseling side," he said.

It could not be determined before press time whether Hathorn was a student, because the Registrar's Office was closed. According to the Campus Directory, he was a sophomore in architecture at the beginning of the semester.

An attempt to contact Hathorn for comment was made, but he was unavailable.

Wildcat fans should exhibit class on the road as well as at home

National coverage. Decades of dominance. Heisman Trophy winners. Devoted fans.

All these things are characteristics of the Wildcat football team's next opponent, the Oklahoma Sooners.

However, for the past four years, none of these things have been a factor when the two teams met.

The Cats are going to Norman this weekend with every intention of extending their winning streak to five seasons.

Those of you planning to take a road trip to Oklahoma, beware. The Sooner fans could be hostile, especially if you follow the logic that K-State won the recruiting battle over several prominent freshmen and junior transfer linebacker Jeff Kelly.

At last year's Nebraska game at KSU Stadium, Husker I-back and native Kansan DeAngelo Evans was booed because he chose to go north with the Huskers.

Kelly and the Cats could face the same chilly reception Saturday at Oklahoma's Memorial Stadium.

As a loyal Cat fan, it would be easy to be drawn into spirited discussion with the surrounding Sooner fans.

But don't stoop to their level. Show the class that Texas A&M fans who attended last week's game have commented on since they left the Little Apple.

Many Aggies populated Aggieville bars and restaurants throughout the weekend. Although they lost the battle on the field, they left Manhattan with smiles and stories to tell their friends in College Station.

If you'd like to go to Norman to support the Cats, contact the Union Program Council at 532-6571. For $70, fans receive a ticket, transportation and lodging. The deadline for signing up is today.

If you're already going, remember to wear your purple and help make a formidable force in the 75,000-seat stadium.

But whatever you do, don't give the Sooner-loyal any reason to dispute the fact that K-State has the classiest fans around.

With the No. 14 team in the country, Cat fans have a lot to be proud of.

Don't give the Sooners a reason to think otherwise.

STAR WARS
A NEW HOPE

Act 6: Justice Attacks Scene 2:
Having invaded Darth Gates' fortress in Redmond, Wash., Princess Janet Reno and Ralph Obi-Wan Nader seek out the evil overlord's private chambers. As the scene opens, our heroes, along with their faithful robot sidekick NS3.0, are searching the bastion, attempting to avoid Gates' flannel-clad, espresso-driven Raintroopers.

Nader: We're running out of time. Gates already has control of the computers. If he gets the Internet, the rebellion is lost. If you had only gotten to this sooner, we would have had more time.

Reno: Look, I've been busy with Gen. Clinton's "coffees" with the Gondarian Empire and the Rebel High Council, so back off! No one asked you to come along anyway, press-hound.

Nader: (Squatting behind a wall and firing subpoenas at a passing cadre of Raintroopers) I'm not in this for the press, but for the people.

Reno: And the presidency?

Nader: (Fixes Reno with a glare, then, with a wave of his hand uses a Jedi mind trick, whispering) I'm in this for the people.

Reno: (A dazed look spreading across her face, her voice sounding faraway) You're in this for the people.

Nader: Good. Now let's go.

(Nader, Reno and NS3.0 dash across a courtyard, into a doorway then into a room. The room is dark except for a computer system's monitor, which flickers against a wall. The computer system is huge, 25 gigabytes of memory or more lie within its 4-foot-tall tower.)

Reno: This must be it, the heart of technological darkness.

Nader: (Shudders) We've got to find Gates before he finds us.

Gates: (From behind) Too late.

(Nader and Reno spin around to face the diminutive prince of evil. Gates looks back and forth between Reno and Nader. The moment crackles with their intense mutual dislike. NS3.0 beeps furiously and then goes "offline," slumping against a wall.)

Gates: I'm so glad that you've come to visit, Obi-Wan, Princess Reno.

Nader: Don't try to sweet-talk us, Gates. Your tyranny is at an end.

Reno: (Holding a paper above her head) I have a charge of civil contempt here for you, "Lord" Gates. The Alliance wants you to stop unlawfully taking advantage of your Windows monopoly to protect and extend that monopoly and undermine consumer choice.

(Gates raises a hand and the paper flies to it.)

Gates: (Nonchalantly looking at the paper) The people have had a choice, Princess, and they've chosen Windows. (He raises the paper to his face, sniffs it and then looks slyly at Reno.) You wrote this on Microsoft Word, didn't you?

Reno: (Sheepishly mumbling) It came as part of a government contract.

Nader: Don't try to change the subject, Gates! Reno here is prepared to fine you $1 million a day if you don't cease and desist your practices.

Gates: (Sarcastically) I guess in about 20 years I would be out of money, wouldn't I?

Nader: (Ignoring the remark) She's also asking a judge to strike down your non-disclosure statements with the Compaq, Gateway and Acer empires so that we can see what kind of deals you've been making.

Gates: (His anger growing) You'll never do it! They allied with the empire of their own volition and their contracts are tighter than Aldebarian hot pants!

Reno: Your evil empire is drawing to a close, Gates!

Gates: (Regaining his composure) On the contrary, my dear princess, it is about to be reborn. Today we launch our ultimate weapon!

Nader and Reno: The Microsoft Death Star!

Gates: Better. Windows 98.

Nader and Reno: (Screaming) Nooooo!

(Gates laughs wickedly, his laughter growing louder as the scene ends.)

Scene 3:
(Rebel Generals Al Gore and Bill Clinton have been watching this tableau unfold on their MPEG video viewer within their secret bunker. The Gondarian Ambassador and his aides are having coffee in one corner, discussing the back pain the ambassador got from sleeping in the bunker's Skywalker Bedroom.)

Gore: I was just thinking something, General.

Clinton: That this is very bad news?

Gore: No...(His voice lowers to a whisper and he leans toward Clinton's ear) ... we have got to learn that Jedi mind trick thing.

(Clinton nods thoughtfully.)

VOLUNTEER & earn a sense of achievement

Volunteerism in America is as old as those immigrants who first arrived at Ellis Island more than a century ago. The immigrants came, as they still do, with a hope and a dream. And, from the old country, they brought a strong sense of community. When they landed at the foot of Manhattan Island, they encountered a new creed, "volunteerism."

As a new American, one was expected to be a "rugged individual." But, in this land of vast frontiers and small government, you were also expected to "help thy neighbor" and to volunteer.

I think this is a tradition in this country. Those better off are expected to do something for those less fortunate. That is part of our history.

There is not a shortage of volunteers who want to give their time to society. For those who don't have the time, there are always financial donations. The genius of American support for volunteerism and charity is that you can do good and also save money through tax deductible contributions.

Contributions by wealthy individuals are not enough. After all, how many wealthy individuals are willing to support our communities? The idea of the private citizen doing more should be emphasized.

The American experience has shown that volunteerism has and can provide much for those who need help, but not everything. If the same goes for the government, what do we do?

The answer, not surprisingly, appears to be a mix: a balance between government, nonprofit organizations and individuals (volunteers). The question is whether we are living in an era of balance or of abandonment.

Experts tell us that people volunteer their time and talents for a variety of reasons. The desire for affiliation, to work with others, to receive recognition and affirmation, and to attain that deep-down sense of achievement which comes from a job well done are all important factors.

Whatever the motivation, each year hundreds of thousands of individuals call to ask "How can I be a volunteer?" The following are just a few of the many ways you, as a volunteer, can make our community a better place to live. Typically, there are already national nonprofit organizations who support these causes.

- Be an adult role model and friend to a child who needs you.
- Encourage your community organization to adopt a highway to keep litter off the roadways.
- Tutor a child. Help a teacher or perform tasks that help schools run smoothly.
- Deliver nutritious meals to homebound elderly persons.
- Get trained to be a crisis intervention volunteer, an empathetic listener and meet the challenges of a 24-hour crisis hot line.
- Learn conflict resolution skills as a small claims mediator volunteer.
- Do you love horses? There are usually retirement homes for horses that need volunteer groomers.
- Help raise the money needed to fund local health and human service organizations, or help decide how that money will be used.

As you can see, there are vast opportunities available for volunteers. Usually, training is provided by organizations for free, and the valuable skill attained is original.

There are many other volunteer positions too numerous to list here. Communities should have volunteer centers to allow easy access for their residents to develop leadership skills.

I personally also had the pleasure to assist AIDS victims and do volunteer work at local hospitals. This has increased my confidence and also given me an opportunity to meet different people from different professions. The personal satisfaction I get in volunteering has given me an opportunity to use my talents in a wide network of fields.

Funding priorities need to be examined

Editor,

I think that we all should take a close and serious look at funding priorities at K-State. In the past year, even as Hale Library was completed, plans for the gutting of periodicals from its interior continued. As the administration was pressed by students and faculty alike to end the cuts, the response was less than enthusiastic.

In fact, administration officials seemed more adept at finding reasons for cutting the amount of journals and periodicals in our library than willing to actively seek concrete solutions to a problem that will not go away.

Yet, in the midst of such a significant unresolved problem, it is suddenly announced that the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics plans to expand KSU Stadium. And they want to use a new student fee. And, by golly, they want it to happen fast.

The K-State Athletic Director Max Urick recently announced that he would like a referendum to occur by mid-November, and he wants to travel to campus and greek housing to explain the expansion. Did anybody notice such decisiveness on the part of administration officials in addressing the needs of the library?

Has the president or provost come by your house to drum up your support to put some heart and soul into our beautiful new library? Don't hold your breath, folks.

The importance of keeping research journals and periodicals in the library is obvious to the students and faculty, but perhaps we have not spoken loud enough. We need to put this stadium expansion on hold, at least until the same sort of energy, motivation and innovation used to promote athletics and to stage super Foundation fund-raising events are exhibited toward the very foundation of our university — our library.

Play field should be left open by Memorial Stadium

Editor,

Count me among the many proponents for maintaining a significant amount of play field and open space south of Ahearn Field House. This area is heavily used by club sports and area residents and offers a scenic respite from the otherwise fully developed Anderson Avenue.

I don't have a particular affinity for the old stadium, even though it was constructed as a memorial. It's just a matter of time before the elements take their toll and the deteriation progresses to an unattractive, unsafe state.

A good architect ought to be able to incorporate the stonework into a very satisfactory memorial replacement at the site, as pedestrian entrances to the new stadium or into the design of the new alumni center.

It is the green space that the old soldier stands watch over that I'm concerned about. After all, the memorial's significance does not lie with the fans' seating area, but in the turf. The turf is the symbolic battlefield on which athletes, like the soldiers they represent, struggled.

I am greatly concerned that inadequate vision is being used in the contemplation of the KSU Alumni Association's proposed facility, relative to both the affected area and the community. While it may be easier to build a new building on the flat, open site at the south end of the old stadium, the cost to this community in lost quality of life is prohibitive.

Instead, I'd like to challenge the architects to develop an award-winning design of space that truly is a gateway and showcase to the community. It should incorporate the historical and memorial elements of the site, the need for parking, a new alumni center, replacement headquarters for entities now using the stadium and quality open areas and play spaces.

Clinton proposes plan to reduce effects of global warming over next 20 years

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — In a decision falling short of environmentalists' hopes and his own promises, President Clinton presented a modest strategy Wednesday to combat global warming by gradually reducing greenhouse gases over the next two decades.

"Make no mistake, the problem is real," the President said.

Clinton

"And if we do not change our course now, the consequences sooner or later will be destructive for America and for the world."

After months of fierce debate within the administration, Clinton announced a plan embracing binding pollution curbs for the first time. But they are substantially below targets proposed by European nations and recommended by environmentalists.

The plan calls for reducing carbon dioxide and other heat-trapping gases to 1990 levels by the five-year period of 2008 to 2012. In the five years after that, the goal is to reduce emissions below the 1990 mark.

"Since it's a long-term problem requiring a long-term solution, it will be phased in over time," Clinton said in a speech at the National Geographic Society headquarters.

Anxiously awaited by global negotiators, Clinton's proposal came under swift attack at U.N.-sponsored talks among 150 countries seeking a consensus on mandatory cutbacks in greenhouse gases.

"Something much more substantial will need to come out of the White House if the United States is to face up to its global responsibilities," said Peter Joergensen, environmental spokesman for the European Commission.

Greenpeace, the international environmental group, said, "This is the 'Black Wednesday' for the climate negotiations."

Now, meeting in Germany, the negotiators are struggling to reach a global climate agreement in time for a December conference in Kyoto, Japan.

Clinton also proposed $5 billion in tax breaks over the next five years to spur U.S. industry to adopt energy efficiencies and develop new technologies that would reduce America's reliance on fossil fuels — even before an international treaty goes into effect.

In the United States, many environmentalists complained that Clinton's policy was too weak, and many critics on the other side warned it would raise energy prices and wipe out jobs.

"It's a minimum starting point. It will not go nearly far enough to get us out of harm's way," said John Adams, executive director of the Natural Resources Defense Council.

On the other hand, House Majority Whip Tom DeLay, R-Texas, said Clinton "has decided that the debate on global warming is over and that we have to do something about it. That something will likely lead to higher taxes, more regulations and a bigger government presence in our lives."

The President acknowledged "I know full well that some will criticize our targets and timetables as too ambitious and, of course, others will say we haven't gone far enough."

Clinton was accompanied by Vice President Al Gore, who has made the environment his top priority. The success or failure of Clinton's policy could have a significant effect on Gore's presidential aspirations.

Gore called Clinton's speech "a historic announcement" and said it would be regarded as the moment "when we really began to solve the most serious environmental problem we face."

Clinton's proposal would provide credits for industries that make early emission reductions. It also envisions an international emissions trading program that allows companies and nations to swap credit for pollution abatement activities.

The president also said that developing countries "must be engaged" in the solution.

Four years ago, Clinton sketched out an ambitious goal to reduce emissions to their 1990 levels by the year 2000 through voluntary reductions. He said that "regrettably, most of us, including especially the United States, fell short."

Clinton and Gore warned that there is compelling evidence emissions of greenhouse gases are warming the planet, causing severe weather changes such as floods and droughts and spreading disease to areas once too cold for germ-carrying insects.

European nations propose that all developed nations reduce gas emissions to 15 percent below 1990 levels by 2010. Japan has proposed a 5 percent cut, which the EU has called insufficient.

Administration officials said their own goal was not achieved because the economy was more robust than expected. Oil prices were lower and Congress did not approve funds that Clinton sought for fuel efficiency and renewable energy programs.

While warning of dire consequences of global warming, Clinton suggested the solutions were simple.

"Most of the technologies available for meeting this goal through market mechanisms are already out there," he said. "We simply have to take advantage of them."

He cited the case of a sixth-grade class in West Branch, Iowa, that used classroom experiments to cut their school's energy use by 70 percent. Similarly, he said that if Americans would buy only high-energy products, "we could shrink our energy bills by a total of about $100 billion over the next 15 years and dramatically cut greenhouse gas emissions."

Treasury Deputy Secretary Lawrence Summers described Clinton's approach at a White House briefing as "a helping hand approach rather than a heavy-handed approach to working to reduce energy consumption. It doesn't provide for mandated increases in prices on energy over the next decade and it does contain a number of provisions that are likely to reduce energy costs."

F-16, trainer jet collide over Mojave Desert; 2 killed

ASSOCIATED PRESS

EDWARDS AIR FORCE BASE, Calif. — A training jet collided with an F-16 fighter Wednesday over Edwards Air Force Base and crashed in the Mojave Desert, killing two crewmen, one British and one American.

The F-16, with two Americans aboard, landed safely on a dry lake bed at the base. The crew members were not hurt.

The T-38 Talon is a two-seat training jet used by pilots to learn supersonic techniques, aerobatics, formation and navigation. The crewmen — one from the U.S. Air Force, and one from the Royal Air Force — were killed.

Edwards is in Southern California and home to the Air Force Test Pilot School. The planes were taking part in a practice bombing run by a B-1B bomber.

The collision comes weeks after Defense Secretary William Cohen ordered all branches of the military to hold a 24-hour safety "stand-down" and review their training procedures after a rash of air crashes. It was the first suspension of all military pilot training.

The series of air crashes started Sept. 13 when an Air Force C-141 transport collided with a German military plane off the coast of Africa. In all, 33 were believed to be killed.

The next day, an F-117A stealth fighter broke up in flight at an air show in Maryland, setting two houses on fire and injuring six people.

The day after that a Navy F-18 went down in Oman, killing the pilot, and a Marine Corps F-18 crashed off North Carolina, killing two pilots. Also, two planes from the New Jersey Air National Guard collided off the New Jersey coast Sept. 16. The three pilots survived.

On Sept. 19, an Air Force B-1B bomber crashed on a training mission in Montana, killing all four crew members.

▸ K-STATE TO FACE another option-oriented team this weekend when it battles Oklahoma in Norman.

FREE SAFETY Cephus Scott, No. 3, and strong safety Jarrod Cooper, No. 40, bear down on Texas A&M back Dante Hall Saturday at KSU Stadium. Hall fumbled the ball, which the Wildcats recovered.

CLIF PALMBERG Collegian

The K-State football team will see some familiar things when it plays at Oklahoma on Saturday.

This won't be because seven Wildcats are from Oklahoma. Instead, it will be because the Sooners have a little of everything the Wildcats have on offense, and it will be the fourth time in six games the Cats face an option attack.

The Cats have a trio of tailbacks, Eric Hickson, Mike Lawrence and Marlon Charles, who have combined for 926 yards through the first six games of the season.

And then there's the Sooners' De'Mond Parker, who has rushed for 1,000 yards in two consecutive seasons, already picking up 1,126 on the ground this year.

"There aren't any, to my knowledge, running backs in the country that are as talented as he is," K-State coach Bill Snyder said.

The Cats have another running threat, Michael Bishop, as quarterback. Bishop is averaging more than 63 yards per game on the ground, and with 27 on Saturday, will set the K-State single-season record for rushing yards by a quarterback, with four games remaining on the schedule.

The Sooners have Eric Moore starting as quarterback. Moore gained 141 yards rushing last week against Baylor, including an 80-yard touchdown run.

And don't forget about the passing game. Both teams have only completed 61 passes this season.

The Sooners will primarily run at K-State, and run the option. K-State faced the option against Ohio, Nebraska and Missouri this season. The Cats beat Ohio and Missouri, but gave up 56 points in losing to the No. 1 Cornhuskers.

"An option offense does put some restrictions on your defense, undeniably, at least it does for us," Snyder said. "The option attack virtually forces you to defend not only the team that you're playing, but the field itself, from sideline to sideline."

Despite their strong running game, the Sooners know they have a challenge ahead of them. K-State's run defense has improved each week, capped by its performance against Texas A&M last week. The Aggies entered the game with K-State with the No. 5 rushing attack in the country. However, they managed only minus 35 yards against the Cats' stingy defense.

In addition to using their option offense to try to end their four-

STEPPING it up a notch

STORY BY SAM FELSENFELD

While beating Texas A&M 36-17 Saturday, many of the Wildcats took advantage of the injured Aggies.

Texas A&M played most of the game without two starting linemen, both down with injuries, and its top running back, Dante Hall, who left the game after the first play with a bruised knee.

However, one Cat used Saturday's game against the Aggies to take advantage of an injured K-State player.

Freshman wide receiver David Allen returned punts for K-State for the third-consecutive game. Allen was filling in for sophomore free safety Lamar Chapman, who suffered a hyperextended elbow Oct. 4 at Nebraska.

Allen didn't make much of an impression when he came in against Nebraska; he fumbled a return attempt, one of three K-State turnovers that night.

But against the Aggies, he made a statement with his play.

Allen returned six punts for 125 yards, breaking Andre Coleman's school record. And now that Chapman is back — he played at free safety in the closing minutes of Saturday's victory — Allen isn't too sure he's going to quietly hand the job back over.

"It's gonna be a fight. We'll see what happens," he said. "It will be a fight back there. No hard

True fans show Wildcat spirit by camping out

"Why am I sitting here?"

That's what kept running through my mind Monday night at the basketball camp out.

"Why am I sitting on this couch in the cold when I could be at home doing something productive, like sitting on the couch watching Sportscenter?"

VIEWPOINT

CRESTON KUENZI

CRESTON KUENZI is a junior in computer engineering. Send e-mail to Creston at creston@ksu.edu.

As I looked around me, I got the feeling other people were thinking the same thing.

"What are we all doing out here freezing our toes off to get tickets to watch a team that has been stuck in the cellar longer than a fine wine when we could be at home preparing a victory party for this weekend's trouncing of the Sooners?"

To be honest, I couldn't figure it out. I was completely puzzled. Why should I put myself through another season of torture?

Then, out of nowhere it hit me like Mike Tyson on Prozac. I had a revelation. A revelation so immense that I now feel obligated to pass it on to all of the Wildcat fans who are still confused, like I was only a few days ago.

The reason we shivered through the camp out, the reason we're going to go to the games this year even if we have to study for a big test the next day and the reason we're going to cheer for the Cats even when they're behind, is all very clear now. We're Wildcats!

Let me explain.

To be a true Wildcat fan means you go out and support the team through thick and thin. Right now, it's really easy to be a Wildcat football fan because, plain and simple, they win a lot.

Make no mistake about it, though. The true fans aren't necessarily the ones traveled to Dallas on New Year's Day to watch the Cats in the Cotton Bowl. The true fans are the ones are going to show up and cheer on the Cats this winter in Bramlage Coliseum.

It's time to find out who really bleeds purple and who bleeds a lavender hue. So today I'm issuing a challenge to myself and Cats everywhere to rise above the typical fair-weather fans you see at other universities.

This year, it's time to show the nation what it means to be a K-State Wildcat. I can't think of a better place to start than next Thursday at Fright Night.

No matter how much you dislike Dick Vitale, no matter how annoying you find him and no matter how much you'd like to take that microphone and beat him on that bald head of his and — oh, sorry, I kind of got carried away there.

Anyway, no matter what your feelings are for Vitale, I'm issuing a challenge to everyone to go support the Cats on Oct. 30 and at every game thereafter.

It's not easy to be an all-weather fan. It's not very fun to watch the Cats struggle against mediocre teams, and it really hurts to watch good teams whip up on us. It's especially difficult to stomach the poundings the Jayhawks have put on us in the past several years.

It takes a lot of courage to cheer for a team when it's down, but in the end it will pay off. Mark my words, the Cats are going to climb back to the top again. It might not be this year or next year or even 10 years from now, but it will happen.

Wouldn't it be nice to be able to say, after we win a national championship, that you stuck with the Cats through the rotten years and be one of the few people who are actually telling the truth?

Men's golf team finishes 3rd at Louisiana Tech Invitational

The K-State men's golf team had a strong third place effort in the Louisiana Tech Invitational in Calhoun, Louisiana's Pine Hills Country Club.

The third-place finish in the 14-team field is the Wildcat's best showing of the season.

The Wildcats shot a three-round combined score of 899, 35-over-par.

Senior B.J. Walter led the Wildcats with a three-round total of 223 on the par-72 course.

After Monday's two rounds, he was in a tie for 13th place at six-over-par. With a one-over-par third round, he moved up to finish seventh in the tournament.

K-State's Brant Benninga finished in a tie for eighth place. He shot a 224 in the three rounds with his career low 71 in the second round. His strong second round put him in tie for third place at the end of day one.

Benninga's third round score of 78 knocked him into eighth place.

Senior Matt Murdoch shot 74-76-76, putting him in a tie for 12th place, while junior Zac Clark tied for 15th place with a 74-78-76. Sophomore Brian Racette improved steadily throughout the tournament. In a tie for 59th place after the first two rounds with scores of 83 and 78, he fired a 75 in the third round to finish in a tie for 50th place.

Arkansas State and Lamar University took first and second place with scores of 888 and 893, respectively.

Andre Prejean of Louisiana Tech won the tournament with a seven-under-par performance.

Women's team claims 2nd in tournament

On Tuesday, the K-State women's golf team claimed second place at the Sunflower/Marilynn Smith Invitational in Andover, Kan. The Wildcats were co-hosts of the tournament with Wichita State and went into the second day of the two-day tournament in second place.

The University of Kansas won the tournament with a 932-stroke total. The Jayhawks had the lead on Monday and didn't look back.

Wichita State's Natasha Ausderau had a 150 total to claim first place for Monday, but KU's Jamie Tucker moved from a second place three-way tie to share the title of co-champion with Ausderau.

Bishop! Awesome game last week. You guys played your heart out," an excited fan wanted to say to his favorite player after the Texas A&M game.

There are times when fans want to run up to one of the K-State football players after a game and tell them how well they played.

Through K-State's online Wildcat interviews, fans can't run up to them, but it is possible to chat with certain football stars.

Online Wildcat interviews take place at 7 p.m. every Thursday. They are 30-minute live interviews with a designated K-State football player. Today's interview is with junior tight end Justin Swift.

"We post as many questions as possible," said Tim McCune, graduate student in software engineering. "Alumni use it a lot. We get questions from Texas, Florida, California and all over the country. It's open to anyone on the Internet. These are a type of interviews very different from what you'll see on TV or in the newspapers."

McCune sorts through all the questions sent to the chat line and decides which questions the player will see. The questions don't have to be sports-oriented, either. Some questions concern personal subject matter. All questions asked are decided by the online audience.

"We had a guy ask a player if he knew an old friend of his. They can be any kind of questions at all. Another guy asked what it was like to play offensive tackle, so the questions really vary," McCune said.

Wayne Becker, junior in interior architecture, said he likes to watch the messages being sent.

"I've watched some of the conversations on the screen, but I haven't ever sent anything. You would be surprised at what you can learn about players on and off the field," Becker said. "It's a lot of fun."

McCune said he tends to steer away questions that deal with injuries, recruiting and other confidential team information.

"The lines are usually loaded, but I sometimes prepare a few questions just in case there is a lag. It usually keeps me clicking fast," McCune said.

The record-setting performance against Texas A&M has many fans eager to hear what players have to say.

Mall becomes reality after 20 years of planning

It was an issue of whether to leave it a cornfield or turn it into a central business district. An adopted land-use plan called for the redevelopment and with the aid of the largest grant ever given to a Kansas city, the Manhattan Town Center was created.

A land-use plan, adopted in 1968, called for the central business district to be maintained as a regional shopping area. The local planning board and Manhattan City Commission had turned down numerous requests to allow development of a regional shopping center on the city's west side in 1971, 1972, 1976 and 1977, according to an article published by The Manhattan Mercury in October 1987.

In 1978, a private consulting firm was hired to evaluate the potential of downtown Manhattan as a regional shopping center for the surrounding trade area. A report published a year later said the redevelopment was feasible, desirable and in many ways essential to the well-being of residents of the entire city.

That same year, proposals from developers for the redevelopment project were requested. After interviewing eight firms, Forest City Rental properties of Cleveland was chosen.

To save downtown, city officials decided to demolish a third of it and build in its place a climatized mall to lure shoppers for years to come, according to The Mercury in a special edition. The mall would take out eight blocks of the downtown and cost $24 million.

The city requested $11.5 million from the Department of Housing and Urban Development in an Urban Development Action Grant. It was initially granted $8 million, so the city restructured the project down to $10 million. On Oct. 28, 1983, the city secured preliminary grant approval.

In early 1984, Dillard's Department Store wanted to join JCPenney and the Jones Store as a major tenant. Soon after, the Jones Store pulled out and Dillard's came in as the second-leading department store.

The mall faced many problems before construction began. Plans called for the demolition of buildings occupying eight blocks of Third Street between Leavenworth and Pierre streets. They would have had to relocate nearly 75 businesses.

Condemnation awards on several of the mall site properties produced acquisition cost overruns of nearly $3.7 million. The project turned into a $60 million downtown redevelopment project.

In July 1985, a verbal agreement to release funding was made, but only after Forest City Rental Properties had agreed to put in an extra $1 million. This money was put into equity in the form of direct payment to the city. The grant was then reduced to $9 million, and final approval was made one month later.

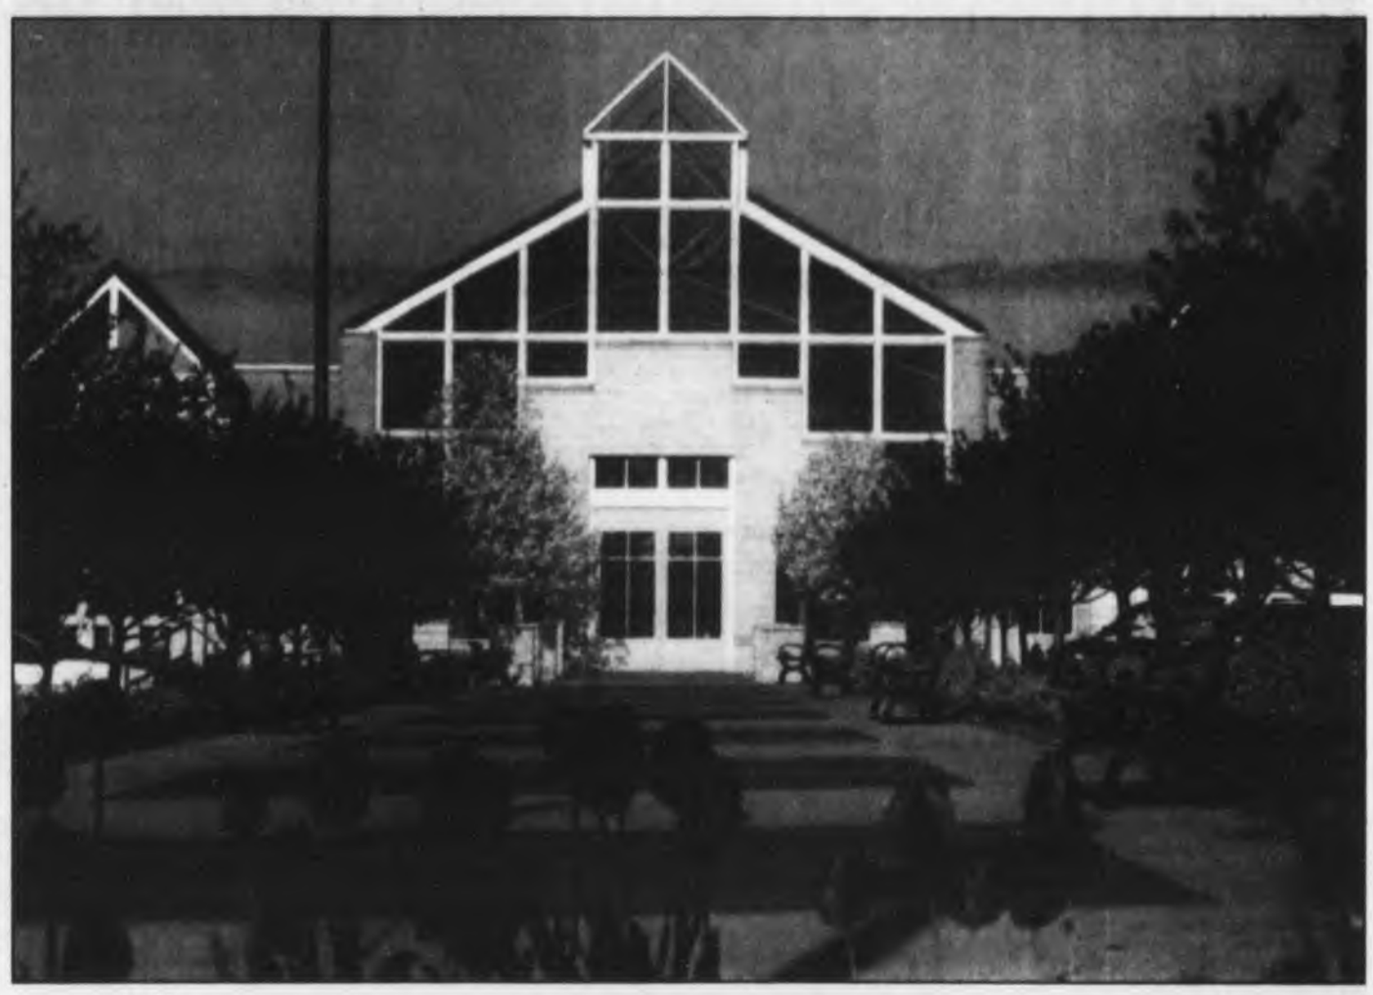
The $9 million grant awarded to Manhattan was the largest grant ever given to a Kansas city.

The city negotiated with 67 land owners and 73 businesses occupying the property to get the land needed to build the mall. Of those businesses, 13 businesses closed, three reopened in consolidation with existing businesses and 56 were relocated.

Formal ground-breaking ceremonies were on June 6, 1986, and one year later the structure was built. Construction went smoothly on the 380,000-square-foot structure and then work began on individual shops, according to The Mercury.

On Oct. 7, 1987, Dillard's celebrated its grand opening with city, mall and company officials. Founder and Chairman of the Board William T. Dillard, was in attendance.

Nearly 20 years since the 1968 land-use plan called for a regional shopping area, the mall opened on Oct. 26, 1987.



The mall reflects 20 years worth of downtown planning. It was built to reflect the architecture and character of the business community it now anchors. Some of the oldest buildings in Manhattan were torn down and their influence is still seen, according to The Mercury.

The design of the building and the mall is supposed to blend with the downtown buildings, said Chris Heavey, former general manager of the mall in The Mercury article.

The Town Center project manager said in The Mercury that research was conducted for a year and a half to ensure that the existing heritage of the area was built into various pieces of the mall.

The feature of the old buildings replicated the most is the rosette. The 12-inch rose symbol adorns the mall inside and out. It is also the official symbol of the Town Center. The design came from the Hopper Building, 200 Poyntz Ave., and was saved and displayed in the mall. The original rosette can still be seen in front of the main fountain on the west side of the mall.

Today, the mall houses three large department stores, 64 small business and two restaurants. The Town Center's theme, "In the Heart of It All," has remained the same over the past 10 years. The Town Center celebrates its 10th anniversary this week.

Manhattan Town Center celebrates decade of business

Manhattan Town Center is pulling out all the stops this week during its 10th anniversary, "Celebration of the Decade."

The anniversary celebration began Wednesday when the mall welcomed the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce Business After Hours. Invited guests were entertained to the theme of "A Taste of Manhattan Town Center" with food and entertainment by a local duo, Cheaper Entertainment.

Today, patrons of the Town Center will be able to enjoy free samples of Kansas food products, giveaways, entertainment and discounted prices throughout the day. Registrations for a cruise and a key give-away for the Purple Power Machine will also take place.

The Purple Power Machine is a Ford Bronco donated by Dick Edwards Ford, Audio Junction and the radio group of KMKF-FM 101.5, KMAN-AM 1350 and KXBZ-FM 104.7.

A children's birthday party will be from 6:30 to 8 p.m. in the food court. Children ages 10 and younger can help celebrate and eat birthday cake with the Town Center lion, TC; Subway's Sub Man; the Vodvill Klown, Richard Renner; and three child entertainers.

"We're looking forward to the kids' party. It's going to be lots of fun," Monnie Applegate, marketing director, said.

Friday's big event is the Anniversary Gala. The evening will consist of mingling, dancing and dining at food theme stations throughout the corridors of the mall. The theme stations will be catered by Holiday Inn Chef Darrin Cave. These will include a carving station, Italian and French Quarter-themed stations, ice carving and dessert displays. Entertainment will include the Hays Big Band and Queen Bay, an internationally known jazz vocalist.

"Ten dollars of each ticket will go to benefit the Mayor's Holiday Tree Fund, and it will be matched dollar for dollar by the McCormick Foundation," Applegate said.

The evening will end with a special indoor fireworks display and presentation by pyrotechnicians from Kansas City and the Toast at Ten to commemorate 10 years of business.

"It's going to be pretty unique and spectacular," Applegate said. "We're anticipating a lovely evening."

Town Center Ambassadors will be helping to staff the event, which has been in planning for 18 months, Applegate said. Those in attendance at the gala will be able to register for a cruise sponsored by Kansas State Travel and for season tickets to McCain Auditorium events. These prizes, along with others, will be given away at the closing of the celebration on Sunday.

Four chances to win a key for the Purple Power Machine will be available during these events. For all key giveaways the recipient must be present to win. All 10 winners will then have the chance to try their key to start the vehicle on Sunday after the final key is given away.

"This was a group effort," Applegate said. "We wanted to have something to introduce at Purple Power Play on Poyntz and continue the momentum until the anniversary. It's something fun and very visual."

Entertainment throughout the week will be provided by different kinds of groups and organizations on the performance stage in center court.

"We have a full schedule of entertainment," she said.

The celebration comes to an end on Sunday with the event "In the Art of It All." A variety of art displays featuring local artists will be shown, and demonstrated throughout the day.

Groups and individuals giving demonstrations including the Konza Prairie Quilters; Sylvia Beeman, papier-maché artist; Bill Wedekind, a blind man without hands who makes pottery; Penne Chaput, porcelain doll maker; and Arlene Thurlow, leather crafter. Manhattan High School Art Club will have a free-standing display of school projects.

Fraternity receives highest chapter award

ZACH VADER
staff reporter

The members of the K-State chapter of Alpha Tau Omega can walk across this campus with their heads high.

The ATOs received three national fraternity awards, including the True Merit, the highest honor given to an ATO chapter.

Bill Muir, assistant to the vice president for institutional advancement, director of community relations and adviser of ATO, said the True Merit emphasizes positive community and campus involvement, as well as focuses on the chapter's goal of graduation and job and career placements for seniors by 1999.

"Only five chapters out of 156 received this award, which is the highest award for overall excellence," Muir said.

The ATOs also received The Anderson Gold Communications Award, which recognizes the Vintage, the student-published magazine that goes to alumni. This award is for excellence in communication including public relations, recruiting, and community, campus and alumni relations.

The fraternity was also runner-up for the Community Awareness Award, an award that recognizes exceptional social services and philanthropic activities.

Three members of the fraternity also shined nationally for the ATOs.

Two Salina natives made a great impression for the national fraternity.

Guy Gross, senior in biology, was the at-large recipient of the National Undergraduate Scholarship Award while Joe Stein, 1997 graduate, was the national runner-up for the Thomas Arkle Clark Award.

"I was very surprised when I got this award," Gross said. "It was such a long process of questionnaires and applications, plus there were so many applicants."

Jon Freeman, senior in biology and former president and rush chair of ATO, was first runner-up for the National Undergraduate Scholarship Award.

"I was very excited to get this," Freeman said. "It shows a great credit to our fraternity, especially with the True Merit."

"These awards were in recognition of how they do things, and they do things well," Muir said. "They really are a good group of people. I've enjoyed working with them for the past 27 years."

The awards will be presented at a banquet on Nov. 15 in Indianapolis, Ind.

Government ends case with confession of bombing's alleged mastermind

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — The 1993 World Trade Center bombing was designed to topple the two 110-story towers like dominoes, killing a quarter million people and convincing Americans they were at war, a federal agent testified Wednesday.

Secret Service Agent Brian Parr closed the prosecution's three-month case against the alleged bombing mastermind by recounting the horror he said Ramzi Yousef wanted to bring to the United States.

"He said he intended for one tower to fall into the other tower and it would cause about 250,000 civilian casualties," Parr said, describing a six-hour conversation Yousef had with agents after his 1995 arrest.

The agent said Yousef sought destruction on the scale of the atomic bomb in Hiroshima, Japan, in 1945 to convince the United States to stop supporting Israel.

Parr said Yousef confessed in great detail about his terrorist activities, including the Feb. 26, 1993, World Trade Center bombing that killed six people, injured more than 1,000 others and caused more than a half billion dollars damage.

Parr's recollection of what Yousef told agents after his capture in Pakistan culminated a prosecution case glued together by circumstantial evidence.

Parr said Yousef found Israeli targets too difficult to attack so he flew to the United States in September 1992 with Ahmad Ajaj, the only person he knew in America, so he could choose bombing targets.

Ajaj and three other men were convicted in 1994 of conspiracy in the bombing and were each sentenced to 240 years in prison. Yousef also was convicted last year of conspiracy in a plot to bomb a dozen U.S. airliners over the Far East.

Parr said Yousef drove from Jersey City, N.J., to Brooklyn the night before the explosion, staying overnight with an accomplice before driving in the morning to the Trade Center.

Yousef hoped a special box he constructed would direct the explosives toward the Trade Center's support beams, crippling the buildings, Parr said.

Parr said Yousef and an accomplice took the van to the Trade Center, parked it and tried to hurry out in a car brought by a second accomplice, only to be delayed for two minutes by a delivery truck.

Then Yousef dropped letters in a mailbox to publications and broadcasters taking responsibility for the bombing and hurried back to Jersey City, where he watched smoke rise from the Trade Center.

Parr's testimony shed some light on how the bombing was financed, which has remained mysterious. Yousef and the others involved in the plot were running so low on money that they had to bomb the city's two tallest buildings before their March rent was due in Jersey City, N.J., Parr said.

game losing streak to K-State, the Sooners will try to take advantage of a possible letdown by the Cats. K-State had an emotional victory over the Aggies last week, and the Sooners will try to catch the Cats looking forward to their November games against Kansas and Colorado.

But Snyder, after watching Louisiana State lose to Ole Miss last week after beating top-ranked Florida in its previous game, is making sure the Cats don't fall into the same trap.

"I think you always are concerned about that. LSU went through the same thing, Penn State went through the same thing, and probably countless others as well. I think those are just two of the more prominent ball games," he said. "You're always concerned about that, but even if it wasn't an emotional win, you'd still be concerned. You're always concerned, regardless of which way it goes.

"I know it's on our players' minds. They're focused on not taking any football team we play for granted and not having a letdown."

While the Cats aren't looking forward to any future games, they are looking at previous games.

Last year, K-State jumped out to a 42-14 lead against Oklahoma, only to watch it dwindle in the fourth quarter. The Sooners closed the gap to 42-35, and were driving toward a score, but an interception by K-State's Chris Canty allowed the Cats to run out the clock and hold on for the win.

"Last year, our offense kept going but our defense stopped working," K-State linebacker Travis Ochs said. "Our plan is not to do that again this year."

On Monday, the Cats shot a team two-round total of 640, eight strokes behind the Jayhawks. Junior Cat golfer Jane Yi was tied for sixth with a score of 157.

Yi shot a 71 in her third round Tuesday, which propelled her to finish with a 228, in third place. Freshman Edie Murdoch ended Monday in ninth place, but moved up to finish in a tie for eighth place with a 235.

Other Cats scores include senior Ann Slater, who tied for 12th with a 239 total; junior Mitzi Taylor, who finished tied for 24th with a score of 248; and sophomore Carrie Chambers, who finished tied for 26th with a score of 249.

Freshman Traci Benninga took part as an individual and finished in a tie for 34th with a 256.

The women's golf team will see action Nov. 2-4 at the Roadrunner Invitational in Las Cruces, N.M.

Becker is thinking about asking a question himself.

"I want to find out if he gets frustrated because of all the scrambling Bishop does, or if he even cares if he gets the ball. It would just be cool to find out what the players are actually thinking, instead of just speculating," Becker said.

feelings, though."

Of course, Chapman didn't do badly returning punts before his injury. He returned a punt 94 yards for a touchdown against Ohio in K-State's home opener, providing enough points to keep the Cats from losing.

Allen didn't have any returns for touchdowns against the Aggies, but he's still happy with his play.

"They have the No. 1 punt team in the nation, so it felt real good," he said.

Allen set the stage for K-State, returning Texas A&M's first punt 24 yards to the Aggie 48-yard line. The Cats scored a touchdown less than four minutes later, taking a lead they would never give up.

"All week on film we saw that he (Texas A&M punter Shane Lechler) would outkick his coverage," he said. "He was outkicking his coverage a little bit, and we figured that if we carried the two outside guys, we'd have a great return."

But his longest runback came after the Aggies' next possession. Lechler shanked his attempt and, after a considerable roll, the ball had only traveled 42 yards, less than his 48.8 average.

Allen was expecting a deeper punt and couldn't field the ball. But the Aggies were slow in downing the ball, so he picked it up and brought it 32 yards upfield.

He might have been in the position to score, but Lechler grabbed his facemask and twisted him down from behind.

With the 15-yard penalty, K-State's offense took over at the Texas A&M 14-yard line.

"I was getting ready to yell 'peter' which means everybody gets away from the ball and lets them field it," Allen said. "What I saw was the guy that was close to the ball kind of backed away from the ball and let the ball roll. I looked upfield, and everybody was just kind of walking because they saw the ball on the ground. I felt it was a perfect opportunity to pick it up and go."

Allen only managed to pick up 10 yards on return No. 3, but he got back into his groove when Lechler punted for the fourth time, just less than two minutes into the second quarter.

This time, Lechler boomed the ball, sending it 64 yards to the K-State 17. However, Allen brought it back 48 yards, giving the Aggies a net of only 16 yards and setting up the Cats with a first down at Texas A&M's 35-yard line.

On that drive, K-State only moved the ball 10 yards and had to settle for another field goal, one that would not have been possible without Allen's runback.

Allen said he hopes to continue on special teams even though Chapman is ready to play again. He also said he hopes he earned himself more playing time on offense.

"I want the ball as many times as I can get it, no matter how I can get it — if I gotta do it on return or if I gotta do it on offense," Allen said. "However I can get it, I can do it."

Monday afternoon, the Big 12 announced that Allen was named the Big 12 Specialty Player of the Week. Chapman won the award when he returned the punt for the touchdown against Ohio on Sept. 13.

ULTIMATE FAKEBOOK'S NEW ALBUM IS A REFRESHING CHANGE FROM THE SKA CRAZE SWEEPING THE NATION

BRING BACK THE ROCK

REVIEW BY PHIL KELLUM

▶ Want to hear Ultimate Fakebook's new album? The eCollegian has sound clips of Electric Kissing Parties. Go to http://collegian.ksu.edu/links/ufb.html

It seems all the hype in music now is about electronica and ska.

But what happened to rock 'n' roll? Well, if all is right in the world, Manhattan's own Ultimate Fakebook will bring rock 'n' roll back to music.

Music Review

"Electric Kissing Parties" is the band's new album, released on Lawrence's Noisome Records.

If you threw equal amounts of Weezer and Cheap Trick into a blender, with just a bit of Pavement on the side, you would have Ultimate Fakebook.

The album kicks off with "Far, Far Away." It's a powerful slab of power-pop that is the perfect leadoff song for the album. It features singer and guitarist Bill McShane's powerful, signature vocals, along with drummer Eric Melin's propulsive drumming and bassist Nick Colby's dynamic bass runs.

The second track, "Diamond Ring," is a slower tune that explodes unexpectedly for certain verses then dies back down after a few seconds.

"All The New Poisons" is a heavier song that has a definite Weezer influence, in my mind. It also features UFB's original drummer, Mot Waldmann, as do four other songs on the compact disc.

McShane's guitar solo is so metal it hurts, but it's a wonderful pain.

McShane often breaks into a beautiful falsetto voice throughout many of the songs, and "Roll (Electric Kissing Parties pt. 1)" features that falsetto at various points in the song. The song starts with McShane singing along with his guitar backing him for about a minute, then builds into the full band rocking out, with Melin's drums taking center stage.

"Downstairs/Arena Rock" is the closest UFB comes to playing a punk song. It's a fast, rambunctious track that has a tiny bit of Descendents influence to it.

There's also a bizarre noise freak out in the middle that surprised me and impressed me at the same time. I love noise when it's done well.

"Having Too Much Fun" is a pretty slow, almost ballad-type song that is a bit of departure for the guys.

"Circus Horrors" is one of my favorite Ultimate Fake Book songs, and it comes off well on CD. It's a fast power-pop number guaranteed to get you out of your seat and dancing around your apartment like you've never danced before. I could have sworn I heard a xylophone rear its head at one point in the song for a couple seconds, too.

UFB returns to the heavier side of their power-pop attack with "Liferaft Halo." McShane's falsetto pops up again and sounds wonderful in the song.

There's a great breakdown about a minute into the song with McShane and Waldmann kicking out the jams.

Colby's bass riffs shine on the intro to "You Won't See Us," as he leads the band into the song with some smooth, walking bass lines. The harmonies on this track are stellar.

The closing track, "Silver Date," is a nice ballad with some top-notch vocal harmonies that's over too fast.

All in all, "Electric Kissing Parties" is a fantastic album from beginning to end with no throwaway tracks at all.

With 10 songs in 36 minutes, these boys waste no time in rocking you. My only beef with the album is I wish Colby's bass was mixed higher up in the sound mix. His bass riffs are incredible, but they aren't very noticeable much of the time.

Also, you don't get the band's patented rock star onstage moves with the album. Maybe they should make some Ultimate Fakebook action figures to go with the album. I smell merchandising.

Ultimate Fakebook is having an album release party tonight at Bombers Upstairs with Danger Bob. So come out and witness both bands' rock-star moves. The show starts at 10 p.m.

Bring back the rock.

GOING BIG TIME

Local country singer achieves success as an opening act and turns his sights to Nashville.

STORY BY SANDI DAVIS

RICK DAVIS, senior in feed science and agricultural technology management, performs Thursday, Oct. 16 at Bobby T's. Davis opened for country musician Tracy Byrd earlier this month.

BRANDON WHITE Collegian

When an opportunity presents itself, the only thing to do is grab on with both hands.

Rick Davis, senior in feed science and agricultural technology management, knows this from experience.

Davis was the opening act for Tracy Byrd on Oct. 3 at Remington's in Topeka.

The opportunity came about after he became the Topeka winner of the Jimmy Dean Country Showdown this summer.

The contest gave him the chance to open for Wade Hayes in Iowa last summer. He then got the call for the Byrd concert.

"They just called up and asked me to do it," Davis said. "I thought it was a joke."

Davis said the concert was unbelievable, with more than 2,000 people attending. Before he went onstage, his friends got the crowd shouting his name.

"That made it even more nerve-wracking," Davis said.

After the show, he spent some time talking with Byrd's road manager, and he got to meet the star himself in Byrd's tour bus.

"The whole thing was just unbelievable," Davis said.

For as much as Davis has accomplished, it would seem like he's been singing country all his life — but he got his start less than two years ago.

A year and a half ago, Davis decided to write a song for his mother, who has cancer. His roommate showed him some guitar chords, so he was able to play for her.

"It was an awesome feeling to be able to say I wrote this," Davis said.

Davis plays guitar and sings, but his real love is songwriting. When he's performing, Davis sings a mix of other people's songs and his own.

"I don't care if I couldn't sing," Davis said. "But I love to write."

His friends convinced him to enter the Manhattan Town Center music contest last year, and he started gaining confidence in his abilities after he won the first round.

Davis placed third at the mall contest, which led to Brady Goodman of KXBZ-FM 104.7 letting him sing live on the air. Davis wrote a jingle about Goodman, which was played on the air frequently.

"They'd have requests for it," Davis said. "That was really great."

For the past year, Davis has been playing weekly at Bobby T's. He starts playing Tuesday nights on Oct. 28 at Longhorn's .

Davis is also trying to get a band together. He already has a fiddle player and a bass player, but he's looking for a drummer and a lead guitarist or keyboard player.

Davis said he prefers old country music to young country. His role models include Hank Williams Sr., George Strait, Chris LeDoux and Dan Seals.

Country music has become an important part of Davis' life. He usually practices five or six hours a day.

"My grades are suffering, but it's what I want to do," Davis said.

After he graduates in December 1998, Davis intends to go to Nashville to try his hand in the country music business.

"I'd love to see myself playing, but I don't know if it'll happen," Davis said. "I want to try it, and I'll regret it if I don't."

Microsoft accused of dominating software industry by requiring PC makers to install Internet Explorer

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SEATTLE — It's been called the Evil Empire, and likened to a breed of "Star Trek" aliens who consume everything in their path.

Now the Justice Department is calling Microsoft Corp. a bully in the browser wars, accusing it of trying to monopolize the way we surf the Internet.

Microsoft's years of business practices that test the legal limits and its long refusal to cower to the antitrust cops have few experts thinking the latest threat will bring the company to its knees.

Even the government's attempt to fine Microsoft $1 million a day would hardly sting a company that last year made $4 million every day — including weekends and Christmas.

"Microsoft has been called every bad name in the book," said Jim Balderston, an analyst with Zona Research Inc. in Redwood City, Calif. "They're pretty thick-skinned."

On Monday, the Justice Department accused Microsoft of using its dominant Windows operating software, which runs 80 percent of personal computers, to shut out potential customers of rival Netscape's Internet browser. The government said Microsoft requires PC makers that install Windows 95 on their products to sell it with Microsoft's browser, Internet Explorer.

Moreover, Microsoft is accused of threatening PC manufacturers who sought to alter its Explorer browser with terminating their licenses for Windows.

The department's antitrust division asked a federal judge to hold Microsoft in contempt of a 1995 court order barring the Redmond, Wash.-based company from anti-competitive licensing. The department wants a judge to fine the company $1 million a day if it is found in contempt and continues the practice.

Microsoft says it is only giving customers what they want, insisting it did nothing illegal and it is confident it can win any court challenge.

In past run-ins with government, Microsoft softened some tactics that got it in trouble, but for the most part it continued its aggressive grab for rivals' business.

For example, Microsoft now thinks twice about big outright acquisitions after authorities in 1995 zapped its proposed merger with Intuit, the maker of Quicken, a deal that would have helped it lock up the market for personal finance software.

But Microsoft, despite the 1995 court order, continued over the next two years to strike deals with nearly every large PC maker to make its Internet Explorer easier for Web surfers to use than Netscape's Navigator.

"Their business culture is not likely to turn on a dime just because of this suit," said Hadley Reynolds, director of research at Delphi Consulting Group in Boston.

Still, that aggressive strategy could backfire, said Jesse Berst, editorial director for ZDNet AnchorDesk, an online news magazine.

By taking a "haughty, self-righteous air," Berst said, Microsoft is sacrificing goodwill and giving free positive publicity to its competitors.

"I think that this stonewalling tactic of theirs is a foolish business decision and it comes out of pride and arrogance, not really thinking through what is really going to be best for your business," Berst said.

Though Bill Gates' extraordinary success — and $38 billion fortune — might cause some sour grapes, many rivals contend his company plays too close to the line of what's permissible in business.

Microsoft's early history was characterized by squabbles with IBM, Apple, have to work with the cattle a little more to keep them from being frostbitten."

RYAN REIFF writes a note on his hand while discussing the morning's chores with Becky Pushee, animal science technician at the dairy research unit. Reiff works 18 hours a week at a dairy plus 10-15 hours on weekends doing farm labor.

Reiff said the job was good for students who didn't have time to work during the day, but hours can be unpredictable as well.

"One night I was down to my last eight cows when the power went out. I had no idea what happened. Instead of getting done early, I was there until one in the morning, and I had to be back at 6 a.m.," he said.

Working at other dairies helped Reiff pick up K-State's milking procedure quickly, said Richard Scoby, research assistant at the Dairy Unit.

"He's a good worker," Scoby said. "We give him quite a bit of responsibility — milking, feed and other jobs around the unit. He's done just about everything."

Scoby said sometimes the dairy needs workers at a moment's notice, and Reiff was helpful.

"He's very willing to come in and help out in a pinch," he said.

Milking cattle isn't something Reiff wants to do the rest of his life. He would like to go into herbicide or seed sales. He also wouldn't mind farming some on the side.

"I love to farm. I've been driving tractors and helping around the farm since I was 5. Cattle were always a way to get through the winter and for something else to do," Reiff said.

Reiff said he wasn't the type of person to find a job where he'd have to do lab or office work all day. He likes keeping busy. He also likes the people he works with and learning more about a field in agriculture that isn't directly related to his degree.

"Not being an animal science major, the dairy gives me more knowledge of agriculture," Reiff said. "It's also a good way to make extra money during the week to help pay for school."

Internet to deliver educational programs to students not living in Manhattan.

"Thus far I am pleased and impressed," Howey said. "There is, of course, the element of personal alienation, a necessary evil with distance education. But it is just part of it and something that people will need to deal with.

"Distance education is a fact and we need to explore new ways to leverage the technology to educate the most students possible," he said.

Ross said one advantage the software has over listservs is the ability to edit the message that is posted as more information becomes available.

Ross said students don't need an e-mail account to take the class, which is a benefit to students enrolling from locations outside Manhattan.

Heath Harding, multimedia specialist and staff assistant for the College of Education, said the college will not abandon listservs, but Web Crossings does have advantages that listservs do not.

Harding said when students log on, it registers them automatically so they only see the discussions they are registered for.

"They will be used side-by-side, "Each one is different and used for different situations.

"This software allows students to establish rapport in a classroom community," Harding said. "You must establish a trust atmosphere before people will talk about controversial issues or issues they feel any kind of commitment about."

Advantages over listservs include an ability to post a picture to personalize messages, send mail to a central location and post mail for an entire group.

The Web Crossing also enables a user to run a search on discussion subjects, stores messages in a central location, and it doesn't require a mail account.

some 737 production to try to unscramble problems caused by its attempt to more than double the number of aircraft it makes.

"If you judge by the number of people they've hired and the size of the writeoff, the problem is greater than they anticipated and Wall Street anticipated," said Bill Whitlow, manager of the Safeco Northwest Fund.

So much work was being done out of sequence on the 747 assembly line in Everett, Wash., that Boeing halted it for 20 working days to catch up.

And during flight tests for Boeing's new-generation 737-700, a flaw was found in the horizontal stabilizer design. Fixing that forced Boeing to stop final assembly on the new 737s for 25 days.

Two years ago, Boeing was turning out just 17 planes a month. Orders plummeted in the early 1990s because of a global recession and a drop in travel due to Gulf War fears. But when airlines became healthy again, they bought planes.

In 1994, airlines ordered 120 Boeing planes worth about $7.8 billion. So far this year, Boeing has announced orders for three times as many jets, 355 of them, worth about $25 billion.

Boeing now produces about 40 planes a month, with a goal of 43 by next spring — 48 if production of newly acquired McDonnell Douglas is factored in.

and talking about the issue in general terms," Robel said. "I think there are pros and cons for both sides of this issue. All components must be looked at before coming out with a definite statement."

Greg Davis, Interfraternity Council president and a member of Sigma Phi Epsilon, said IFC would support all houses whether they banned alcohol or not.

"I think fraternities practicing safe risk management provides a safe atmosphere," he said.

Davis said IFC was giving presentations to the fraternities and sororities to help educate its members so a crisis can be stopped before it happens.

He also said he supported fraternities going dry when the undergraduate body votes for it, not the national fraternity or alumni.

"It's the body — they're the current fraternity members. They make the fraternity, and it should be what they want during school," Davis said.

He said all IFC could do was support and educate fraternities on the practice of safe risk management.

"You don't have to ban alcohol from fraternities to know how to control it," he said.

Jennifer Gorman, Panhellenic Council president and a member of Alpha Chi Omega, said she supported the NPC in supporting fraternities to ban alcohol.

Besides being a good risk management step for those fraternities taking the step to become dry, she said it will also decrease liability and help in the recruitment process to get new members.

"You can still have fun without alcohol involved," Gorman said.

Senate sets date for stadium expansion vote

TRAVIS LENKNER
staff writer

Student Senate approved a binding referendum vote Thursday night to decide the fate of student involvement in the expansion of KSU Stadium.

Through the referendum, students will have the opportunity to vote on whether they want to support the creation of a privilege fee to fund a portion of the expansion.

In a 41-13 vote, student senators approved a special election scheduled for November 17 and 18. Polling sites will be established at the K-State Student Union and in the Veterinary Medicine Complex.

Students who vote in support of a privilege fee will also be asked to choose between two plans submitted by the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics. One calls for a fee of approximately 50 cents per credit hour. The other proposes an approximate $1-per-credit-hour increase in fees to pay for the expansion of the number of guaranteed student seats.

Under the two plans, students would be guaranteed 9,000 or 10,000 student seats, respectively. Currently, 7,500 seats are guaranteed. Student football ticket prices would also be frozen at $10 per game for the next four years.

If the $1 fee is approved, the athletic department would also create a special 1,000-seat section for recent graduates. Alumni could purchase season tickets at 66 percent of public cost for two years following their graduation.

The department had originally proposed the alumni section if any privilege fee was approved, but Privilege Fee Committee Chairman Aaron Otto said cost was a factor in the decision to cut the section from the 50-cent fee plan.

"When they (the athletic department) looked further into the number of seats under the smaller fee, they didn't think they could guarantee the number of seats in the smaller plan," Otto said.

The creation of a privilege fee must receive at least 60 percent of student vote to pass.

Student Senate has final control over the amount of a possible fee if the referendum passes. But Otto, in arguing for the bill, said he hopes senators will use the opinion vote to

WHAT WILL THE NOV. 17-18 REFERENDUM BALLOT INCLUDE?

• A binding referendum vote will lead the list of questions. It will ask whether or not the voter supoorts establishing a privilege fee to pay for expanding KSU Stadium.

• A student opinion question will be included. Those who vote yes for the privilege fee can choose whether they prefer an approximate $1 per credit hour or approximate 50-cent per credit hour fee. This vote is non-binding, and is only a measure of the opinion of those who voted for the fee.

Rising tuition puts students in record debt

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON — College students are graduating with more debt than ever, a burden affecting their lifestyles and job choices, according to a survey of 2,500 students in several states.

Tuition and fees at public and private colleges have increased an average of 25 percent for the period, which is one reason for the students' debt increase. Another factor is that more of today's financial aid comes in the form of loans rather than grants.

The survey was conducted by Nellie Mae, the largest nonprofit provider of student loans in the country.

The average total debt of the students studied was $18,800, compared with $8,200 in a comparable survey by Nellie Mae in 1991, the Boston Globe reported Thursday.

The survey found that the average debt for student borrowers who went to public four-year colleges was $13,000, compared with $17,500 for those who went to private colleges.

For those who went to graduate school, the average debt was $24,500, and for those who went to a professional school, it was $48,500.

Borrowing for graduate schools, especially in the fields of law, medicine or business, produced the most dramatic increase, said Sandy Baum, a Skidmore College economics professor and a survey consultant.

In 1981-82, federal grants made up 54.6 percent of student financial aid, and federal loans comprised 41.4 percent. By 1995-96, federal grants made up only 39.7 percent of financial aid, and federal loans were only 58.9 percent.

Most of the students interviewed were in Massachusetts, New York and California, where the cost of college typi-

Worldwide financial markets rocked by plunge in Hong Kong

THE MELTDOWN

THE HANG SENG INDEX of blue chip stocks in Hong Kong freefell 10 percent on Thursday. For the week, the index is down 23 percent.

THE DOW JONES industrial average trickled 229 points at one point, but gained ground at the end of the day inching its drop to 186.88 points.

DU PONT was the biggest gainer on the day, up 1/2 point to 60 1/8.

INTERNATIONAL BUSINESS MACHINES was the top point-loser swooning 4 7/8 to 100 1/4.

NEW YORK — A panicky stock sell-off in Hong Kong reverberated Thursday throughout Europe and the United States, where the Dow plunged almost 230 points before rebounding slightly.

It was the fifth-worst point drop in the Dow's history, though not even close to the largest percentage drop.

"Nobody knows which way to go," said Tatsuya Enomoto, chief foreign exchange dealer at Sumitomo Bank Ltd. in New York.

In Hong Kong, which analysts had believed was immune from the financial turmoil roiling the rest of Southeast Asia, the Hang Seng index of blue-chip stocks dropped 10 percent for the day, a plunge of 1,211.47 points to 10,426.30.

It now is down 23 percent for the week, following large meltdowns across Asian stock and currency markets that began this summer.

Hong Kong shares got off to a volatile start Friday as the Hang Seng index plunged nearly 200 points, rebounded 196 points and then ended up back almost to Thursday night's level.

"People are scared. Investors are so uneasy," Kent Rossiter, senior institutional sales manager at Nikko Securities Co. (Asia) Ltd., said before trading began.

> "NOBODY KNOWS WHICH WAY TO GO."
> TATSUYA ENOMOTO, CHIEF FOREIGN EXCHANGE DEALER

In the fallout of the assault on stocks in Hong Kong — a bastion of capitalism in Asia despite China's takeover in July — major stock indexes fell more than 3 percent in Japan, Britain, France and Germany. Shares were off more than 5 percent in Mexico and down more than 8 percent in Brazil.

In the United States, the Dow Jones industrial average tumbled 229 points at one point, or by 2.9 percent. But Wall Street's best-known indicator recovered some lost ground, still closing down 186.88, or 2.3 percent, at 7,847.77.

The shock came just days after the 10th anniversary of the Oct. 19, 1987, crash that sent the Dow plummeting 508 points, or nearly 23 percent. But even with Thursday's loss, the average still is up almost 22 percent this year.

Gerald Gorman, 64, a retired editor watching the ticker at a Fidelity Investments office in New York on Thursday afternoon, was hoping for a larger sell-off so he could buy some of his favorite stocks more cheaply.

"Even 1987 didn't unnerve me," he said. "In fact, I did some buying then. It would have to be an extreme drop of several hundred points, accompanied by social disaster. It would have to be really apocalyptic."

If there was a winner Thursday, it was the U.S. bond market, which soared on the tur-

Military to examine photos of jet crash

ASSOCIATED PRESS

EDWARDS AIR FORCE BASE, Calif. — Photographs taken just before a training jet and an F-16 fighter collided in flight will be closely examined for clues into the accident that killed two crew members.

The two military planes collided Wednesday over the Mojave Desert, just weeks after the first-ever suspension of all military pilot training for a safety review. The T-38 crashed into a remote gunnery range at Edwards Air Force Base.

U.S. Air Force Lt. Col. William R. Nusz and British Air Force Flight Lt. Leigh Alexander Fox, who was participating in a pilot exchange program, were killed, officials said.

The F-16 had slight wing damage and landed safely on a dry lake bed runway, said Lt. Col. Bob Williams, a base spokesman. Its two crew members were not hurt.

The Air Force would not speculate on the cause of the crash.

Edwards is in Southern California and home to the Air Force Test Pilot School, which tests military planes and is also a space shuttle landing site. The F-16 and T-38 were in a routine flight alongside a B-1 bomber, taking photographs to document the accuracy of dummy practice bombs, base spokesman John Haire said.

Instead, the pictures from the F-16 might provide clues as to what went wrong. It's not known whether any film was recovered from the training jet.

The collision occurred while the aircraft were at about 2,700 feet.

The T-38 virtually disintegrated on impact, spreading debris over a three-quarter mile area. The largest visible portions of the twin-engine plane were one engine and the engines' cover. The plane's impact created a crater about 4 feet deep and 200 yards wide.

Investigators said there was some live ordnance in the vicinity.

The base immediately imposed a temporary halt on flights for its 26 F-16s and 12 T-38s, Williams said. That suspension remained in effect Thursday, base spokesman Gary Hatch said. The F-16 is a single-engine aircraft with air-to-air combat and air-to-ground close air support roles. The T-38 is used by pilots to learn supersonic techniques, aerobatics, formation and nav-

Crumbling attic still serves as classroom despite complaints

JACOB JANSONIUS
staff reporter

The studio in the attic of Fairchild Hall is not what most students have in mind for an ideal classroom. In fact, Fairchild 308 has produced complaints from many of its occupants.

Erica Bowden, sophomore in architectural engineering, said she hates working in room 308.

"It's an attic. They stuck us up there in an attic. And just like any attic, it is usually hot and dusty," Bowden said.

The room Bowden and other architectural students work in has four small window air conditioners.

Beth Ricklefs, sophomore in interior design, said the air conditioners have trouble keeping the room cool when temperatures rise.

"It's really hard to concentrate on your work when the atmosphere you work in is uncomfortable. It can get really hot up there. Nobody wants to work up there when you have to dread the heat," Ricklefs said.

Because Fairchild 308 is an architectural studio, many eraser shavings, scraps of paper and dust particles find their way to the floor. Bowden said the room is rarely clean.

"The floor is usually dirty, and dust is all over the shelves and tables," she said. "I don't think janitors clean the room very often."

Scratched tables, punctured walls and graffiti also add to the room's unattractiveness.

Fairchild 308 is one of K-State's oldest rooms on campus, and the squeaky, wooden floor is indicative of its age.

"People have carved all sorts of things on the walls over time. One wall even has 'Merry Christmas' sketched into it," Ricklefs said. "The walls are white plaster, so it's almost like an invitation to carve something into it."

> "It's really hard to concentrate on your work when the atmosphere you work in is uncomfortable. It can get really hot up there."
> • Beth Ricklefs

Dave DeBusman, project coordinator for Crumbling Classrooms, said work is being done in the Fairchild building, but whether Fairchild 308 would be upgraded was unknown. Crumbling Classrooms is a Kansas Board of Regents program that earmarks money for classrooms in disrepair.

"The rooms repaired are on a priority list, and a lot of repairs have to be held off until the summer or until a break. In order to repair a classroom, we have to work around the room's schedule," DeBusman said. "People can put in requests for upgrading classrooms, but there are still priorities."

No immediate plans for upgrading Fairchild 308 are being made, but former students who have had classes there are hoping those plans can be changed.

Wayne Becker, junior in interior architecture, said he would like to be made soon.

"I'm sure a lot of people don't like having to go there late at night or in the heat of the day. I don't mind it. It's definitely not the greatest place in the world, and it could certainly use some upgrading, but overall it's still usable," Becker said. "Let's just say if I wanted to give my parents a tour of our university, they wouldn't be going there."

4 car rammings target women in Pottawatomie County

WESTMORELAND, Kan. — Women driving alone between Manhattan and Topeka on U.S. 24 have been the victims of four car rammings since Sept. 27, Pottawatomie County authorities said Wednesday.

One of the women sustained minor injuries.

The women have had difficulty describing a suspect vehicle, although one said it was a white truck, said Pottawatomie Sheriff's Detective Shane Jager.

"All of the victims have been quite frightened, as you can imagine, which has made it difficult for them to try to identify the car," Jager said. "And in three of the cases, we've had nighttime or dark driving conditions."

The latest incident was Saturday when a fast-moving car came up behind a westbound car driven by a Manhattan woman and rammed her car between St. Marys and Belvue.

The woman pulled over but was followed by the other car onto the shoulder at about 9:10 p.m. The woman pulled back on the road but was followed by the other car, with the driver flashing his lights until finally pulling off near Wamego, Jager said.

Other incidents occurred Oct. 16 east of St. Marys, Oct. 5 west of Wamego and Sept. 27 east of Manhattan.

The victim of the Oct. 5 incident sustained minor injuries when her car was rammed twice and forced off the road.

Philip Morris Co. evaluates smokeless cigarette, lighter

NEW YORK — Philip Morris Co. is testing a smokeless tobacco system that uses a special cigarette and pager-sized lighter to reduce smoke, ash and odor.

The company said Thursday it plans to give the Accord smokeless system to about 100 adult smokers in the United States and Japan.

"Many smokers have told us they would like to have a cigarette which offers less ambient smoke, less lingering odor and less ashtray mess," said John R. Nelson, senior vice president for business development.

Unlike regular cigarettes, the battery-powered Accord allows tobacco to burn only when it is puffed. But smokers must lift the entire device to their lips when they inhale, the company said.

Smokers will still inhale the same amount of tar and nicotine in conventional ultralight cigarettes.

The cigarettes will cost up to $2.75 a pack. The cigarette holder, a battery charger and a pack of Accords will be sold in starter boxes for $50.

Critics, such as Richard A. Daynard, chairman of the Tobacco Products Liability Project at the Northeastern University School of Law in Boston, charge the product is an example of how far the tobacco industry will go to make a dangerous habit socially acceptable.

New York Times chairman, publisher to speak at Washburn

TOPEKA, Kan. — Arthur Ochs Sulzberger Jr., publisher and chairman of the board of the New York Times, will lead a series of seminars Nov. 17 at Washburn University as part of the school's Oscar S. Stauffer Executive-in-Residence Lecture Program.

The program, which started in 1996, brings business and political leaders to Washburn.

Sulzberger joined the Times in 1978, became publisher in 1992, and last week was named to succeed his father, Arthur Ochs Sulzberger Sr., as chairman of the New York Times Co.

Grandfather kills 4-year-old as he backs up utility truck

WICHITA, Kan. — A 4-year-old boy was killed Wednesday when he rode his bike behind a private utility truck just as his grandfather began to back it down the driveway.

Jesse Moyer was dead at the scene of the accident in Sedgwick County about 2:30 p.m.

A family friend had tried to warn the grandfather, but he apparently did not hear, said Sheriff's Sgt. Barbara Byerly.

Jesse always had a smile on his face and liked to pick strawberries from the garden and ride his bike, said his great-grandfather, Loyd Pennington.

MAN WITH A PLAN

Professor receives $3,000 award for research work in transportation economics

Michael Babcock, professor of economics, has been adding to the achievements and awards lining the walls of his office for the past 25 years.

"It was a big office when I moved in," Babcock said.

Now the awards, along with the stacks of papers and books Babcock uses to work on his research, have nearly taken over his office.

Babcock added another award to his belt this fall when he received the Edgar S. Bagley Research Award. The $3,000 award is given annually to a faculty member in the Department of Economics who has had an outstanding year of research, Babcock said.

"I had a good year in the sense that I got some outside grants to do some research that benefited me, benefited the department and benefited the state of Kansas," Babcock said.

Babcock got involved in transportation economics in the 1970s when the agricultural economics and the economics departments were joined. He started helping researchers one summer even though he knew nothing about transportation economics.

After the grants ran out, he decided he needed to learn more about transportation economics.

"Now, here we are 20 years later," Babcock said.

Twenty years and several awards later, Babcock is recognized nationally and internationally as a leading researcher in the field of transportation economics.

He has received awards for his research in agricultural transportation, intermodal competition in the intercity freight markets and the effect of public policy on transportation market shares.

"He brings to the economics department an international and national reputation in the transportation area," James Ragan, economics department head, said.

The new award on his belt of achievement isn't the first Edgar S. Bagley Research Award Babcok has received. He also earned the award in 1989 and 1993, Babcock said.

Babcock has a long list of achievements as a result of his tenacious research abilities, Ragan said.

"The Bagley award is based on cumulative research, and year after year he is effective in terms of bringing in grants and publishing his research," Ragan said.

Babcock has no plans to stop researching issues of transportation economics. He is working on a research project for the U.S. Department of Agriculture to prove there is a way to predict in advance how many loads of wheat will be transported by rail cars.

There's only one stipulation Babcock said he has to follow.

"My wife said that I can't go down to the office on the weekends anymore," Babcock said with a laugh.

Rival schools battle online

▸ COLLEGE JEOPARDY PUTS Sunflower-State rivalry into digital age.

LESLIE NACHTRAB
staff writer

Students from K-State and the University of Kansas are getting the chance to take their Sunflower-State rivalry into the digital age — by going online.

College JEOPARDY! Online, sponsored by Columbia TriStar Interactive, is an online version of the TV game show but is designed for college students.

More than 30,000 students, including K-State students, have entered into the 12-week tournament that began Sept. 1 for the chance to battle it out with rival schools and win prizes.

"We thought the college-rivalry aspect would be fun," said Joanne Hvala, director of communication at Sony Corporation of America. "A sort of test for brains rather than brawn."

The site keeps an updated list of the top-100 colleges in the tournament. In the eighth week of the tournament, K-State ranked 98th on Wednesday, but dropped out of the top 100 by Thursday. KU was unranked.

In the Big 12, Texas Tech ranked 13th Thursday with Texas A&M following at 19th.

Other colleges ranked on Thursday included Iowa State University, Wichita State University and Baylor University.

Even with the qualifying rounds of the tournament winding down, Hvala said there is still a little time to register and play.

"We're coming to the last phase of the contest," Hvala said. "It's the college-student audience's final chance to get prizes, because you have to play a certain number of games to be entered for prizes."

Players can register to play the game at the site, find the rules of the game and see how individuals and their universities are comparing with other contestants. The site also has a boot camp where experts offer preparation and study tips to players.

The answer-with-a-question format is kept the same as the original show, but the categories are more college-oriented. Categories include such topics as TV spinoffs, hairstyles, world capitals and U.S. presidents.

The first 10 weeks of the tournament are qualifying rounds. Players must play three to five games a week to have their score ranked for that week. Each week's top-10 players advance to the semi-finals. The next 100 highest-scoring players as of Nov. 10, the end of the qualifying rounds, also qualify for the semi-finals.

In the last two weeks of the tournament, semi-finalists participate in an elimination tournament. The final three individuals advance to the final round. The final tournament will be at an undisclosed location.

Prizes are awarded to individuals, not colleges. Weekly winners and runners-up receive different prizes including $100 gift certificates from the Gap, $400 worth of Sprint PC service per month for six months and Pontiac jackets. The tournament champion wins a choice of a 1998 Pontiac vehicle.

The World Wide Web site, called the Station, can be found at www.station.sony.com. A second tournament is scheduled for Jan. 5 through March 30.

Dairy Day offers farmers education on increasing production, efficiency ▸ ANNUAL EVENT FOCUSES on importance of cow comfort in production.

AMY BICKEL
staff writer

Kansas dairy farmers can learn more about increasing milk production and cow comfort during the 19th-annual Dairy Day on Thursday in Pottorf Hall at CiCo Park.

Sponsored by the Department of Animal Science and Clenzade Chemical Co., Dairy Day helps update dairy farmers on research developments at K-State.

This year, Dairy Day will focus on cow comfort.

"Keeping them dry, out of drafts and reduce heat stress in the summer are things that keep cows content," John Shirley, associate professor of animal science, said. "It's true that the content cow will produce more milk."

Different K-State animal science professors will speak about cow comfort. The main speaker is Dr. Gordon Jones, a veterinarian who will present "Cow Comfort in Freestalls."

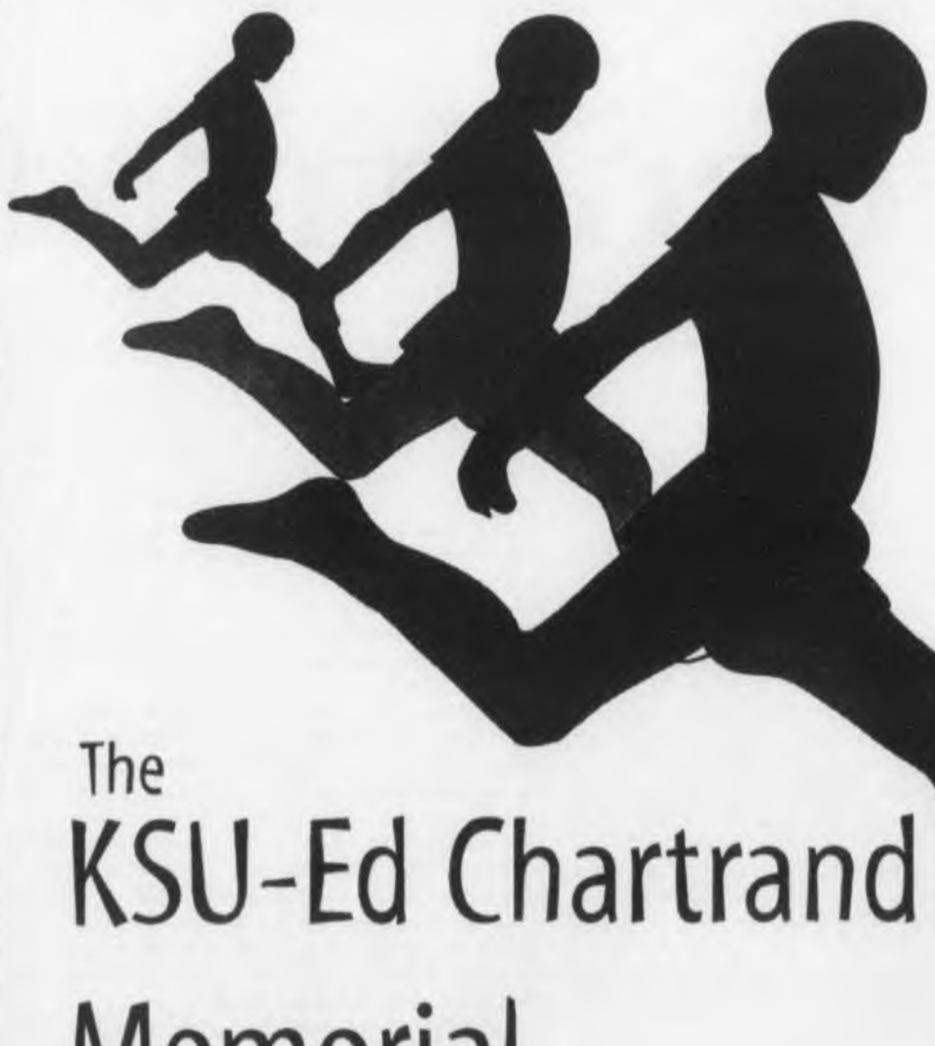
Shirley said K-State has sponsored Dairy Day since 1977. About 250 to 300 dairy farmers throughout the state are expected to attend.

James Dunham, extension dairy specialist, said Dairy Days have been well-received by dairy farmers.

"That's why we get good turnouts every year," Dunham said. "Each commodity group has a day, like Cattleman's Day, and this is ours."

Besides research, dairy farmers can look at commercial exhibits. Dairy equipment and pharmaceutical and feed companies are some of the exhibitors.

"It's our role to educate dairy farmers and hope they will gain some ideas in meetings like this to help produce more efficiently," Dunham said.



Much of the setting up for Dairy Day is done by the Dairy Science Club.

Matt Meyer, senior in animal science and president of the club, said several students go each year to see what research is being done and to meet prospective employers.

"This is an opportunity for students to speak to different companies, a networking opportunity with producers. It's beneficial to know people in the industry," Meyer said.

He said the day was a good opportunity for the animal science department to showcase its research.

"Producers can see the headway being made that's applicable to their operation," Meyer said.

Smokers, nonsmokers need to exercise courtesy, understanding

Puff the Magic Dragon probably never bothered anyone with his smoke, because he lived by the sea. But here in landlocked Kansas, smokers can't help but get the smoke in the eyes of some folks.

On the front steps of many halls, piles and piles of cigarette butts can be found, sometimes right next to a cigarette receptacle. Though there might be all sorts of underlying reasons for these misplaced cigarette butts, there is something all students can do to help stop the spread of these butts.

Don't use the cigarette receptacles as a place to discard your pop cans, banana peels or auto parts. When there's room in the cigarette receptacles, more butts will make it in.

As we wave good-bye to the toasty days of summer and hello to the frostiness of fall, more and more smokers congregate closer to the doors of buildings. Because there's nowhere else for all smokers to go, just be sure to be considerate of people entering and exiting the building. Don't block the way or make people wade through a smoky haze.

If you feel the need to smoke while walking through campus, please take care to notice where you're flinging the hand holding the lighted cigarette. You might catch someone's hair on fire, causing discomfort for all involved.

As a sagacious smoker once said, "It doesn't take much to watch where you're blowing smoke." Even though that smoke might be tasty to you, it could be the trigger of an asthma attack for someone else. Take care to not let your smoke billow onto passers-by.

And for all you nonsmokers, understand that most smokers are addicted. If it were easy to quit, there certainly wouldn't be nearly as many smokers roaming about as there are now. A little patience and understanding can certainly go a long way.

Smokers and nonsmokers alike need to foster an understanding and respectful relationship for each other. As the saying goes, "Hate the cigarette, not the smoker."

Bluegrass embraces the human spirit

Finally. My rite of passage had come to pass. I had to go all the way to Kansas City, Mo., to do it, sustained only by a Bit O' Honey bar and the postmodern ramblings of my dear friend Paul. But in the end, I knew it was the right thing to do. And a tasty way to do it.

A packed church. Two guitars. Doc Watson.

Performing in front of my own eyes was this bluegrass god, chucklin' and pickin' old-time tunes like he was sitting on his back porch, ol' hound dog lying off to the side.

BRANDI HERTIG

BRANDI HERTIG is a sophomore in print journalism and English/ creative writing. You can send your e-mail comments to Brandi at blh0377@ksu.edu

Bluegrass is a genre of music that, unless you're exposed to it early in life, you have to let it grow on you. Like hair. Or teeth.

And I'll admit, the twang of the banjo and the general inbred feeling the music gave me upon first hitting my virgin ear was not something I enjoyed. It made me feel strange, like I was at someone's grandparents' house after church on a Sunday. I didn't like going to anyone's grandparents' house, especially on a Sunday.

Then there were the images of ol' Uncle Jim makin' moonshine from his still on the back porch.

And so my struggle began.

But details are just details. Let's just fast forward to present times, granting y'all the privilege of skipping over the ugly era when bluegrass was indeed attaching itself to me, not unlike a larvae of some kind. As French is the language of love, the banjo and guitar are the language of Brandi.

So there I was, squished compactly into the seat high above Doc and his playing cohort, Jack Lawrence. Sure, the seats were uncomfortable (it was a church, after all), the big guy next to me kept hogging the armrest and some kid behind me farted along to the music for the whole first half. But that doesn't mean it was completely unenjoyable. Anyway, every rite of passage can't be painless.

After bluegrass granddaddy Bill Monroe died a few years ago, I was sure there was no chance for me to ever see the real masters of the music play.

I'd forgotten about Doc.

And so, in the crowded church, with the lights dimmed low, Doc and Jack spent two hours trading jokes (mainly having to do with suppositories and hearing aids) and causing the crowd to burst into ear-splitting applause after each song.

As I sat there, I knew I would be unable to appreciate the magnitude of the situation before me. But at the same time, I knew that this wasn't the Walnut Valley Festival or a Bill Monroe tape. This was legendary, and I was there. I would've wet myself if I'd known it wouldn't call attention to my sopping britches.

Having attended many concerts with Paul, I thought I knew what his response would be. I figured he would sit there stodgily, without expression, until the concert was over. Then afterward, when asked what he thought of it, he would reply in the same stodgy manner, "Oh. It was great."

But there was something different with this concert. Though I know he'd always dug the other concerts he's been to, this time it was visible. The smile on his face, the tapping of his fingers on his knee — Doc had gotten to him, too.

To the naked eye, all of this was just an ordinary concert on an ordinary Saturday night. People fart and fight over arm rests every day the world over. There was no outward reason this particular evening would warrant much afterthought. Before I went, I would have preferred to stay home and spend time with loved ones.

After a rousing revival of "Black Mountain Rag" and two standing ovations, it finally dawned on me that bluegrass is much more than a concert. It's just about bringing folks together and having a little fun.

Moonshine not included.

A LACK OF TIME AND EFFORT CAN CHANGE YOU FROM A FRIEND TO THE FORGOTTEN

KELLY FURNAS

KELLY FURNAS is a sophomore in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Kelly at krf5663@ksu.edu

Apparently, I was never meant to have a friend for life.

I hardly talk to anyone I went to high school with. This wouldn't be such a sin if I went to high school in another state, but I went to high school 50 miles away in Topeka.

Making the transition into college put a lot of strain on my friendships. Part of it was because of distance — some of my friends went to the University of Kansas, others went out of state. I didn't even see much of my friends who went to K-State because the campus was so large. For the first time in 12 years, I was in classrooms in which I didn't know anyone.

But the strained friendships eventually turned into torn friendships. Now it seems all of the friends I had in high school are nothing more than correspondents. Some of them communicate sparingly via e-mail. Others occasionally call. Most, however, seem happy with the fact that I only occasionally think about them.

But I deserve most of the blame. A lot of the fault falls squarely on my shoulders. I am always too stubborn, too lazy or too busy to put the effort into salvaging friendships.

Sometimes the opportunity to maintain a friendship presents itself, and I don't take advantage of it. I will be on campus and walk by someone I know, but I will pretend I don't see them. Part of me is embarrassed that I haven't called them in a long time. Another part of me is saying I have to move on from old relationships. As soon as I walk by them, however, all of me wishes I had said something.

There is something terrible about not acknowledging people whom I've shared a history with. It's even worse when I've shared time with them.

My best friend throughout high school is now a student at K-State. In fact, one of the reasons I chose to go to K-State was because I'd be with her. But we don't talk anymore. She's made an effort, and I made an effort (albeit not a good one). Now all of our discussions consist of "I'll call you — sometime." We both blame our crippled friendship on lack of time. She, after all, is just as busy as I am.

The truth is, our friendship has changed to the point where I can no longer value it as much as I once did. When friends grow apart, it's because they are no longer there every moment they're needed.

Instead of being with me when I was lonely, she was doing something that was important to her life. When she called me, chances were I was in the middle of something I needed to do. Schedules of college students take few prisoners. The best friendship I ever had was a casualty of that war.

The effects are not always so dramatic, however. Some would find it humorous that I forget the names and faces of people I hung out with less than two years ago. One time, on my way to campus, I ran into a familiar face who stopped me with a "Hey, Kelly." I was all set to just nod and keep walking, but she stopped and seemed like she wanted to talk. I had to say something.

"Hey ... you."

Out of kindness or ignorance, she didn't try to expose the fact that I had no idea what her name was. I was fairly sure she went to my high school, so I mentioned Homecoming, talked some meaningless chit-chat and went along my way. Every time I've seen her since then, we've just nodded to each other.

There are the sacred few who put up with my terrible behavior. Well, actually, there's just one — she goes to KU. She'll call me even though I never call back. She'll write me although I've never picked up a pen. She'll e-mail me, and I won't even take the time to type a quick reply. She is tireless in her attempts to maintain a friendship even when it must seem that I have no interest in it. She's the perfect friend.

Unfortunately, not many other people would be willing to sacrifice so much for so little in return. That problem will undoubtedly present itself again over the next four years, as the friends I've made in college leave and we exchange empty promises to "stay in touch."

They say people who don't learn from history are condemned to repeat it. They call those people fools.

K-State fans show pride, class during A&M game

Editor,

I was one of the Texas A&M fans in attendance at last Saturday's A&M vs. K-State football game. I would like to take this opportunity to thank the fans of K-State football for their hospitality during our visit.

Everyone we met was friendly and helpful. The K-State fans carry themselves with class and pride for their team and school without being negative or derogatory to the visiting team. I was very impressed with the K-State students and fans. This is college football the way it should be.

I'll look forward to seeing you all in the Big 12 championship game next season. Good luck the rest of the way this year.

Stadium plans in need of more seats for students

Editor,

I am writing you with concern about the article in Wednesday's paper on the stadium expansion. After recently attending the K-State vs. Nebraska game in Lincoln, Neb., I would love to see the addition of seats to KSU Stadium.

Every K-State fan who attended the Nebraska game or who has experienced the sound of 70,000 screaming fans would agree that a larger crowd could only help our beloved Cats.

My concern comes from the fact that the students will be fronting the bill. I am not displeased with this idea, I think it is a good one. Our campus fees are already spent on things that many students do not or cannot participate in, so why not let at least half of them enjoy the football games?

The thing that upsets me and should upset many of my fellow students is the location of our new seats. As the plan now stands, student seats would be in the north end zone on either the upper or lower levels.

Because we are paying for the seats, why can't they expand the student seating into sections 22 and 23, which would make the student section bigger instead of breaking it into two different segments?

If Athletic Director Max Urick really wants the students to pay for this new addition, then he shouldn't expect us to sit in the corner of the end zone with a less-than-adequate view of the field. Giving the students sections 22 and 23 would allow for greater participation from the crowd and might show the alumni side how important it is to be loud and supportive on every down instead of just on critical plays.

Anderson widening plan needs easy revisions

Editor,

The Collegian report Monday alerted me that the Governmental Relations Committee intended to endorse the Anderson Avenue project as it is. Here's just what we need — another clique of bureaucrats making the wrong decision for us. This "government" does not represent me. I can think for myself.

I do not endorse the Anderson-widening project as it stands now: without safe bicycle access, without pedestrian right-of-way and the destruction of all green space in the process.

When will governments, agencies and committees get it? Progress is a win-win model of change.

A win-win model on Anderson would be to design a plan that complements nature, provides safe bicycle access and assures pedestrian right-of-way.

These revisions are easy enough to consider. Then K-State should endorse the Anderson Avenue changes.

Zoo offers safe, fun alternative

▸ SUNSET ZOO CELEBRATES with costumes, candy

LAURA POPE
staff writer

Children of all ages are invited to Spooktacular at Sunset Zoological Park from 4 to 8 p.m. Saturday and Sunday to enjoy a safe trick-or-treating atmosphere, said Angie Fenstermacher, marketing director of the zoo.

"With the college campus and Fort Riley being so close, a lot of people don't know their neighbors too well," Fenstermacher said. "This provides a safe place to go trick-or-treating."

Sunset Zoo has sponsored Spooktacular for seven years. Fenstermacher said it used to have a scary trail but has switched to a children's trail.

"We have fun witches and fun ghosts," she said. "There is nothing scary about it at all."

Spooktacular plans to entertain children throughout the two evenings with activities and appearances, including face painting, crafts, a costume contest and the D.A.R.E. car. There will also be 30 candy stations. Each are staffed by costumed characters such as Winnie the Pooh, Batman and Elmo.

Children who want to enter the costume contest should register at the zoo's main entrance between 5:30 and 5:45 p.m. The contest judging will begin at 6 p.m.

A martial arts demonstration will be presented by the Korean Martial Arts Fitness Center between 4:30 and 5:30 p.m. each night.

Admission is $3 per child. Adults are free with each paying child, unless they are planning to get candy, Fenstermacher said.

"Spooktacular is a fund-raising event for Sunset Zoo," she said. "Proceeds from all our events go into a zoo improvement fund to build such things as the new ape exhibit."

Circle K, K-State Pre-Veterinarian Club, West Hall and Alpha Tau Omega volunteered to help with Spooktacular this year. Fenstermacher said volunteers are a big reason the zoo can put on the event.

Fifteen ATO members will volunteer their time to gain social service hours for the semester, said Rich Cole, ATO social service coordinator and junior in business.

"We're just doing it to get involved and volunteer off campus," Cole said.

Michelle Renner, zoo volunteer and senior in biology and life science, said letters have been sent asking for volunteers. West Hall put up a sign-up sheet for residents and plans to help pass out candy.

New shuttle saves time, pain of campus parking

▸ BUS SERVES AVERAGE of 92 students daily.

LANDON TRAWNY
staff writer

Parking Services put a new shuttle bus into action Tuesday.

Darwin Abbott, director of Parking Services, said the $30,000 shuttle was needed to replace the aging van that was used before.

The new shuttle seats 13 passengers, compared to 10 in the old van. It also has more room and easier loading.

"The new van gives us more room for people with backpacks," Abbott said.

Sonyanata Hardy, senior in family life and community services, said she agreed the new shuttle is more user-friendly.

"It's not as crammed. You don't have to climb over people to get off," Hardy said.

Dale Roberts, a shuttle driver, said he enjoys driving the new vehicle.

He said it's not as noisy, whereas people sitting behind the driver in the old van could distract the driver with talking.

Use of the shuttle bus is free to all students and faculty. The route runs from Edwards Hall to the K-State Student Union, then to the KSU Foundation and back to the Union before returning to Edwards Hall to begin the route again.

One round trip takes about 25 minutes. The shuttle service runs between 7:45 a.m. and 5 p.m. Monday through Friday.

Abbott said more people are beginning to use the shuttle, and it is serving an average of 92 people a day.

He said the service is a small glimpse of how a full-scale shuttle system could serve students and faculty in the future.

"It gives us a feel of how people like it," Abbott said.

Abbott also said Parking Services will know more about the feasibility of a campuswide shuttle system after the TranSystems Corp. conducts its Manhattan and K-State transportation study, which should begin in November.

Hardy said she likes the idea of a full-scale shuttle service.

"Over the week it saves me hours, rather than looking for a parking spot. And I don't have to worry about getting parking tickets," she said.

Abbott said many people alleviate parking woes by parking at or near Edwards Hall and the KSU Foundation and riding the shuttle, rather than looking for parking on campus.

Hardy said she enjoys saving money on gas for her car but would be willing to pay for a shuttle-service expansion because of its convenience.

Meats judging team spending time preparing for contests

KERRY BOYDSTON
staff writer

Chilly coolers decorated with livestock carcasses hanging from the ceiling greet the K-State Meats Judging Team at each practice.

"The constant analyzing and thinking about meat really gets to you after you spend a few hours in the coolers," said Dixie Theurer, junior in agricultural economics.

The meats team is just one of the many intercollegiate competition teams within the College of Agriculture.

"This is a great way for us to represent the College of Agriculture and K-State at the same time," said Travis Larson, junior in agricultural education. "We like to project a friendly agricultural perception to our opponents when we go to a contest. I've always been very competitive, and through meats judging, I am able to extend that competition to a collegiate level."

Theurer said the team competes with universities from across the country and spends a lot of time traveling.

"Every Thursday, we drive to Emporia to work out at IBP Inc.," she said.

"Contest-wise, we've gone to Denver, Fort Worth, Houston and High Plains, Texas, and we still have the American Royal and the International contest in Dakota City, Neb., next month."

Meats contests consist of different competition categories. Judgers place beef, lamb and pork carcasses and retail cuts according to the trimness, muscling and quality of the cut.

"We also yield grade beef carcasses and determine if they are cut according to written specifications," Theurer said.

Yield grades are the measure of percent of muscle versus the amount of fat in a cut, Larson said.

Despite spending a majority of time traveling to and from contests, Larson and Theurer both said they have learned a lot about themselves through the competitions.

"I have been taught to be more responsible and to manage my time," Theurer said. "This is a unique opportunity that has helped me develop the ability to think on my feet, make sound judgments and have a great competitive spirit."

WATCH JIM MOORE COACH AGAINST HIS FORMER SCHOOL AT 7 P.M. SATURDAY IN AHEARN FIELD HOUSE

Ex-Wildcat coach makes return visit

SUN DEE MILLS
sports editor

Coach Jim Moore and the Wildcats.

For the past three years, saying those names in the same sentence equaled the K-State volleyball team.

This season, those names together mean K-State vs. Texas.

Moore is credited with a Wildcat turnaround, taking the Cats from 36 consecutive conference losses to the NCAA Tournament last season. He did the same thing at his previous institution, Northern Michigan.

His efforts didn't go unnoticed. This spring, Moore left for Austin to continue the winning tradition of the Texas Longhorn volleyball team.

In Austin, Moore replaced Longhorn coach Mick Haley, the winningest coach in Texas' athletic department history, who went on to coach the U.S. Olympic team.

Moore said he's had many challenges adjusting to life as a Longhorn.

"It always takes time to feel comfortable," Moore said. "When I moved from Marquette, Michigan, to Manhattan, it took time to feel comfortable. Relationships take time."

For instance, Moore said comparing his relationship to senior Cats setter Devon Ryning and Longhorn setter Pavlina Steffkova is like comparing apples to oranges.

"I've known Devon for years, so it's impossible to compare or expect that," Moore said. "I try to take everyone at face value. The administration at UT has been outstanding, and the people have treated me kindly."

Between her parents, her brother, new recruits and No. 12 Texas A&M coming to town Friday, Ryning said she's been too busy to think about it.

"I just really haven't thought about it, because we're completely focused on A&M," Ryning said. "Off the court, we were friends, and I'm excited to see them, but I haven't had time to think about it."

Moore said he has thought about it, and the Longhorn's Saturday night match with the Cats in Manhattan will probably be the most difficult thing he's done so far.

"When I left Northern Michigan, the player I was the closest to was a senior named Jenny Long," Moore said. "She was the only senior at Northern Michigan. If I had to play Northern Michigan, I would have been extremely difficult. Now, I have to face that."

After meeting the Aggies on Friday night, the Cats will face Moore and the No. 11 Longhorns on Saturday.

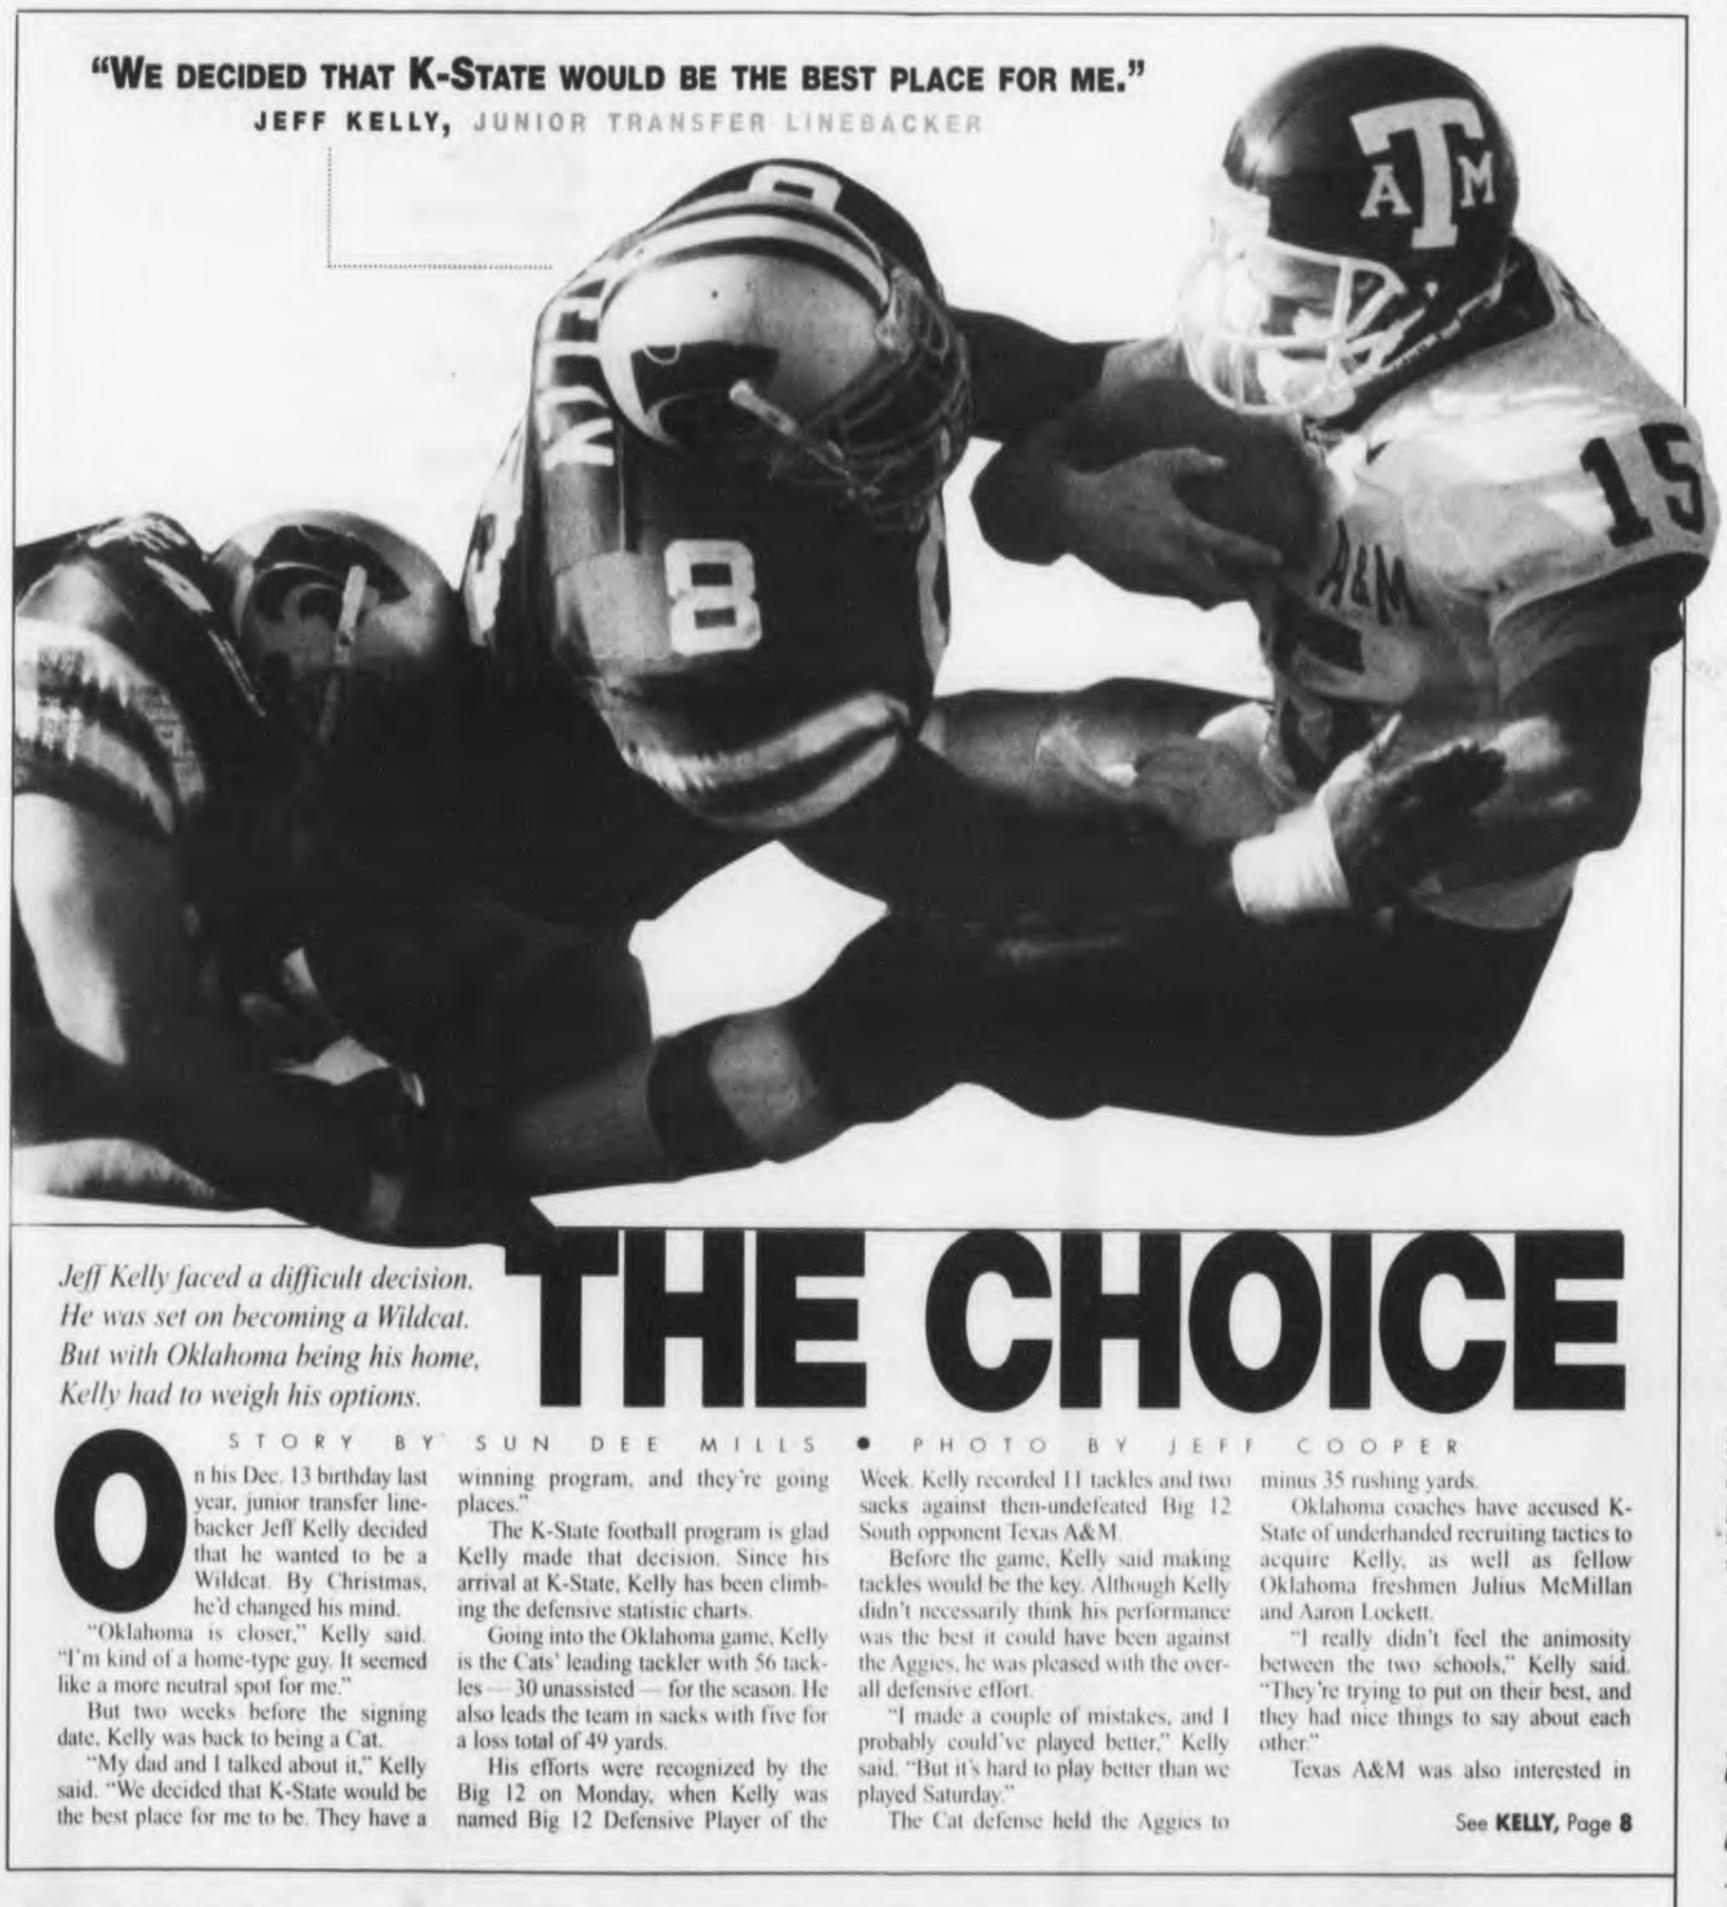
"Texas A&M doesn't make a lot of errors, and they hit the ball hard," Ryning said. "They're real consistent. We just have to be able to side-out this weekend."

The Longhorns picked up three-game wins over No. 9 Nebraska and No. 19 Colorado last weekend. Both are teams the Cats lost to at the end of September.

However, Moore said he's done nothing different in the line of coaching with his new team.

"Basically, I'm doing the same thing since I started coaching volleyball in 1989," Moore said.

"Offensively, I'm basically doing the same things I did at K-State. But I hope I'm a little better than I was in '89."



Moore uses a fast-paced offense, which is similar to the 1984 U.S. Men's Olympic team. He calls himself extremely competitive and said this is one time he might not necessarily think competition is the greatest thing.

"I think I know them well enough to know they'll all do everything in their power to beat me," Moore said. "But they know me well enough to know that I have one goal, and that goal is to win."

FORMER K-STATE volleyball Head Coach, Jim Moore, will return to campus on Saturday when his new team, Texas, will play K-State at Ahearn Field House. Texas is ranked No. 11.

THE CHOICE

Jeff Kelly faced a difficult decision. He was set on becoming a Wildcat. But with Oklahoma being his home, Kelly had to weigh his options.

On his Dec. 13 birthday last year, junior transfer linebacker Jeff Kelly decided that he wanted to be a Wildcat. By Christmas, he'd changed his mind.

"Oklahoma is closer," Kelly said. "I'm kind of a home-type guy. It seemed like a more neutral spot for me."

But two weeks before the signing date, Kelly was back to being a Cat.

"My dad and I talked about it," Kelly said. "We decided that K-State would be the best place for me to be. They have a winning program, and they're going places."

The K-State football program is glad Kelly made that decision. Since his arrival at K-State, Kelly has been climbing the defensive statistic charts.

Going into the Oklahoma game, Kelly is the Cats' leading tackler with 56 tackles — 30 unassisted — for the season. He also leads the team in sacks with five for a loss total of 49 yards.

His efforts were recognized by the Big 12 on Monday, when Kelly was named Big 12 Defensive Player of the Week. Kelly recorded 11 tackles and two sacks against then-undefeated Big 12 South opponent Texas A&M.

Before the game, Kelly said making tackles would be the key. Although Kelly didn't necessarily think his performance was the best it could have been against the Aggies, he was pleased with the overall defensive effort.

"I made a couple of mistakes, and I probably could've played better," Kelly said. "But it's hard to play better than we played Saturday."

The Cat defense held the Aggies to minus 35 rushing yards.

Oklahoma coaches have accused K-State of underhanded recruiting tactics to acquire Kelly, as well as fellow Oklahoma freshmen Julius McMillan and Aaron Lockett.

"I really didn't feel the animosity between the two schools," Kelly said. "They're trying to put on their best, and they had nice things to say about each other."

Soccer tourney dedicated to former Wildcat

JOEL WHITE
staff writer

This weekend's 19th Annual K-State/Ed Chartrand Memorial Soccer Tournament at Anneberg Park will not be an ordinary men's soccer tournament.

It will be a tribute to a former K-State soccer player and a grass-roots effort to promote soccer in the Big 12. Also, it will have national tournament qualifying implications.

The tournament is dedicated to Edward E. Chartrand, a K-State graduate and four-year member of the K-State soccer team. He died in May 1979 at the age of 22.

Edward Chartrand's brother, Art Chartrand, also a K-State graduate and four-year member of the K-State soccer team, said he has several reasons to help make the tournament possible each year.

"The primary reason for the tournament is to have an on-going, living tribute to Ed Chartrand," he said. "The other reason for the tournament is to keep soccer alive in the Big 12 until the Big 12 takes over."

Soccer in the Big 12 is now at the club level, but Chartrand said his goal is to make it a varsity sport.

Chartrand was integral in launching a Memorial Soccer Tournament Internet site. He said he hopes the Web site can help turn soccer into a Big 12 varsity sport.

"It has become a hub for the Big 12 teams," he said. "It's a way for the Big 12 teams to contact each other easily."

Since 1979, the Chartrand family and private donors have raised more than $100,000 for K-State soccer. Art Chartrand said most of the money has gone to the tournament expenses, but some of the money is used for scholarships.

Today's athletes overplay tragedies; meaning lost in armbands, patches

VIEWPOINT

DAN MERKER

DAN MERKER is a senior in computer science. You can e-mail to Dan at dmerker@ksu.edu.

Being a baseball fan, I am naturally watching the World Series. In fact, right now I am having a very difficult time writing my column because the game is tied.

In watching the Florida Marlins play in the National League Championship Series and World Series, I have noticed most of their players, especially the pitchers, have Alex Fernandez's No. 32 written prominently on their hats. Fernandez injured his shoulder early in the playoffs and is out for the remainder of this season and probably all of the next.

While I appreciate the showing of team spirit and unity and that they have rallied behind Fernandez, this is a bit overboard.

Sports have always done a good job of showing proper respect to tragedies, whether it is by wearing a black armband, a patch, the number of someone who died or his initials.

As disappointing as Fernandez's injury might be, it's far from a tragedy. That word is used too often in sports, and the true meaning of the word is forgotten or decreased.

Grant paves way for renovations

MATT KREPS
staff writer

Downtown Manhattan will get a facelift courtesy of a little-known grant program.

The Manhattan Main Street program offers grants to small businesses for structural improvements leading to economic boosts for the community. It is sponsored through the National Trust for Historic Preservation.

Scott Morrill, director of Manhattan Main Street, said the program works in the promotion, design, development and organization of small businesses; it is also community-based.

"The main purpose is to provide incentives to create jobs in downtowns," Morrill said. "It's kind of unique in that it allows the community to establish the requirements for funding."

Last year, funding from Manhattan Main Street helped renovate the second floor of the Ulrich building at 103 S. Fourth St. The project totaled $9,000, $5,000 of which came from Manhattan Main Street.

This year, the program will fund two projects. Funding will help the Chamber of Commerce renovate its new building and remove a metal facade from a building at 405 Poyntz Ave. The building's second story will be reopened as office space after the facade is removed.

The Chamber of Commerce project is part of a $220,000 renovation of the old KPL building at 501 Poyntz Ave. The project's funds will pay for a Poyntz Ave. entrance and remodel the restrooms to meet Americans with Disabilities Act requirements. Work is already underway on the building.

The new building will offer an expanded visitor's information center and a small-business development center.

"This facility will really be a community service," Dan Colantone, president of the chamber, said. "What's so exciting about the the expansion is that it will add member services."

The new building will have 6,300 square feet. It will also include a multipurpose room and two conference rooms that the current facilities in the Colony Square building do not have.

The second project will also increase business opportunities downtown.

The building houses Geometrics and On the Avenue. A metal facade covers the north side of the second floor of both buildings. The facade will be removed and the interior renovated.

Julie Strecker, owner of Geometrics, said the project would bring back the original appearance of the building.

"The false facades are just a mistake that we need to correct," she said. "We'd like to see the downtown building facades restored to their original state. From our standpoint, you cannot attract new businesses to a dumpy downtown."

Strecker said the building's original windows and exterior behind the facade are still in good condition. Much of the renovation work will be to remove changes made to support old signs that hung outside the building.

Funding through Manhattan Main Street is available to any business downtown. The only requirements set by the state are that private matching funds be available for the project and that the project create jobs or business opportunities.

All applications are reviewed by a local board. The top projects are passed to the state level for funding.

"The program is available to anybody downtown," Strecker said. "They think that there's a lot of red tape, but there's nothing."

Kelly, but he said the school didn't offer him a scholarship.

After bonding with linebacker coach Brent Venables, Kelly said he became even more sure about his decision.

"This team is winning," Kelly said. "If you want to establish yourself, you go to a team that will let you play."

An early-season battle for a starting position with fellow linebacker Turelle Williams ended when Williams was injured in the Ohio game by a chop block. Kelly has started in every game except the Missouri match-up, and he hasn't looked back.

The game Saturday pits the Cats against another option attack, something Coach Bill Snyder said vaguely resembles previous opponents.

"They have the ability to run the same type of option like Nebraska and Missouri," Snyder said. "They also have the same I-back running game."

The fact that the Cats gave three fourth-quarter touchdowns to the Sooners at KSU Stadium last season leads the defense to adopt a simple attitude.

"This year, we're going to play four quarters of football," defensive end Joe Bob Clements said. "Last year, we didn't play four quarters of football."

But Kelly doesn't want to look at the past. Especially when it comes to choosing football programs.

"I chose K-State for one reason: reality," Kelly said. "They're not living in the past, but looking at the future."

Did he make the right choice?

"Look what's happening," Kelly said. "No doubt."

the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. The competition begins after the ceremony.

The Association team will be squaring off against the International team. The object is to win as many games as possible in the three-day competition. Points will be awarded for each victory, and the team with the most points will be recognized with an engraved trophy at Sunday's award ceremony.

The Association team is composed of five to eight groups of students who already belong to a club.

Jaw Lin Ong, ICC public relations committee chairman, will help conduct the Olympics and will also participate on the International team.

"I will be there helping out, and I'll be there throughout the weekend when they need help," Ong said. "It should be a lot of fun."

The International team will be made up of students who don't belong to any association.

"You can play with anyone from any country. That gives everyone a chance to participate on a team," Ong said.

Ashraf Al-Qudah, graduate student in economics, is signed up for the International team and is excited to start the Olympics.

"It's good to have something like this. It's a good opportunity to meet more people, and you can interact a little bit more," Al-Qudah said. "I plan on playing basketball with my friends. I'm not that good, but I'll try my best. I hope a lot of people participate."

The Olympics do not only consist of athletic events such as basketball, volleyball or tennis. There are water balloon tosses, Pictionary games, chess, checkers and even sack races.

Youssefi is not sure how many people are signed up for the ICC Olympic games, but she thinks things will go well.

"If we get a positive response from everyone, we'll continue to do it. It's something different, so it should be fun," Youssefi said.

Team to compete in Iowa regatta

MICHAEL RYAN
staff writer

The K-State women's crew will travel to Iowa City, Iowa, this weekend to compete in the Head of the Iowa regatta.

One week after sending only one varsity boat to Boston, the team will send more varsity and novice teams to Iowa.

About 60 women will be making the trip, and eight boats, five varsity and three novice, will compete.

Last week, K-State's lone entry in the Head of the Charles picked up confidence by performing well in a race that featured some of the best crews in the world.

"We strive to be the best team we can be, no matter who we're competing against," junior rower Tricia Troyer said. "We worked really well as a team in Boston, and we want to take that to Iowa."

Despite finishing 31st out of 50 teams in the Championship Eights, the team knows it's moving forward.

"There were so many great teams there," junior Darcie Kelley said. "It did us a lot of good to know we can compete with them. We're just looking to keep improving ourselves. We want to improve every time we go out."

Both women said they were also excited about the novice team making its first trip.

"It's going to be a great experience for them," Kelley said.

Troyer said the team would do well.

"The novice are improving a lot. They're getting the big things down, and I think they'll be strong in Iowa," she said.

The team will be back in action Nov. 1 in Manhattan at the Class Day regatta.

TRIBUTE

When longtime announcer Mel Allen died last year, the New York Yankees wore a black armband on their uniforms for the remainder of the season. This was a proper sign of respect and mourning.

When Kansas City Royals' owner Ewing Kauffman died, the team not only had a tribute to him on their uniforms, but renamed Royals Stadium to Kauffman Stadium out of respect and gratitude to him.

The Chicago Bears permanently have "Papa Bear" George Halas' initials on the sleeves of their uniforms.

These are proper signs of respect for tragedies. A bad shoulder is far from a tragedy, and the Marlins are showing disrespect to all before and in the future who have a tribute to somebody on their uniforms.

Bobby Bonilla has a bad hamstring. Why not add the No. 24 to the black hats? Gary Sheffield has a tender wrist. On goes No. 10. I think Kurt Abbott has a hangnail. How 'bout No. 7? One of the bat boys just got braces. That hurts. Is there still room for No. 97?

There are so many sad things going on in sports right now. John Cullen of the Tampa Bay Lightning is battling for his life with cancer. This is cause for them to wear a patch with the No. 19 on it. Vladimir Konstantinov of the Detroit Red Wings was nearly killed in an automobile wreck this summer and probably will never play hockey again. His No. 16 should be worn much more prominently than the Marlins are wearing Fernandez's No. 32.

I do feel bad for Fernandez. This could very well have been his only chance to pitch in the World Series, but in no way does his injury deserve the same effort and tribute as a death or near-death.

Maybe one of the reasons the Marlins were able to beat the Braves (ha, ha, Sun Dee) and reach the World Series was their team unity — the same unity they're showing in wearing their fallen teammate's No. 32 — but it's a moral responsibility to draw a line somewhere.

Otherwise, whenever someone hobbles off the field, a tribute will be made, one which will belittle all previous tributes to those who were truly deserving and those who truly suffered.

SOCCER

This year, a $500 Ed Chartrand Memorial Scholarship will be awarded to a K-State soccer player.

The tournament begins at 6 tonight with a feature game between the K-State and University of Kansas women's teams.

After the women's game and a youth game, the K-State men's soccer team will face the University of Kansas.

The K-State men's team has a 2-1 record against Kansas this season.

The top two Big 12 finishers in the tournament will qualify for the National Collegiate Soccer Association's National Tournament in Phoenix.

With an 8-1 record on the season, the K-State men's soccer club is full of confidence.

Dan Feimster, junior in chemical engineering and club member, said he likes the team's chances to do well this weekend.

"Our team has really come together," he said. "We have a great chance of qualifying for the NCSA Nationals."

73-year-old prospective juror believes Nichols was pawn in bombing plans

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DENVER — Describing Terry Nichols as a "nice-looking" family man, a retired federal employee speculated Wednesday that Nichols was a pawn in Timothy McVeigh's plot to bomb an Oklahoma City federal building.

The prospective juror in Nichols' trial said she was surprised when Nichols was charged in the bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building, which killed 168 people and injured hundreds more.

"Well, I kind of had the idea from the way that things were transpiring that he probably didn't do it," said the 73-year-old Denver-area great-grandmother.

"My personal view was McVeigh was a very strong-minded type of individual," she said. "I think maybe he had a strong enough personality that people were afraid not to go along with what he said."

The woman called the April 19, 1995, bombing a "gory thing," and she said McVeigh's conviction and death sentence were "cut and dried."

"I think they knew from the get-go that he had done what he did. Whether he did it alone or not, that's something we'll never know," she said.

As a former Bureau of Land Management employee, the woman said she might not be able to set aside the knowledge that she could have worked in a bombed-out federal building. "I'm still afraid of Ryder trucks," she said.

> The population is getting way out of hand, and as much money as it costs to keep an individual in prison and have them on death row for 15 years, just get it over with.
> • Denver-area great-grandmother, a prospective juror in Nichols' trial

She also complained to U.S. District Judge Richard Matsch about being summoned for jury duty at least once a year.

The woman is one of nearly 100 prospective jurors who have been questioned since Nichols' trial began Sept. 29. The process entered the 18th day Wednesday. Prosecutors said a jury could be seated by the middle of next week.

Others questioned Wednesday included a Denver-area school district employee, an amateur soccer coach, a vocational teacher and a ski resort property manager who told the judge she would be bitter if chosen to serve on the jury.

"I've been working for five years to get to this point to be able to run the business," the woman said. "I would lose a big opportunity."

She recalled being stunned when she saw pictures of the devastation caused by the bomb, saying they showed injured children and chaos.

She also said the death penalty should be imposed more often because governments spend too much money on convicts who have no remorse for their crimes.

"The population is getting way out of hand, and as much money as it costs to keep an individual in prison and have them on death row for 15 years, just get it over with," she said.

McVeigh's jury was seated after 99 prospective jurors were questioned over a 17-day period last spring.

Authorities have alleged McVeigh and Nichols planned the bombing months in advance to avenge the deaths of about 80 people in the government's raid on the Branch Davidians compound near Waco, Texas, in April 1993.

They contend McVeigh recruited Nichols to help acquire components and construct the ammonium nitrate and fuel oil bomb.

Defense attorneys say Nichols didn't know about the bombing in advance and was at home in Herington, Kan., when the blast occurred.

Nichols, 42, is charged with murder, conspiracy and weapons-related counts in the bombing. If convicted, he faces the death penalty.

Six ways to make your life a little easier, and your home a whole lot safer.

Natural gas is a safe, efficient fuel – if you'll keep these simple suggestions in mind.

Follow your nose.
In its natural state, the gas that fuels your home is odorless. So KPL adds mecaptan – a substance that smells, well, like rotten eggs.
If you smell gas, get out. Don't strike a match, flip a light switch, turn on a flashlight, or even use your phone. Any of these can create a spark. Gather your family and pets and call us from a neighbor's phone. Dial 1-800-794-4780, and we'll be there to check it out.

Inspect for perfection.
Make regular visual inspections of gas appliances to make sure the burner flame is burning blue. A yellow flame indicates the fuel is not burning properly. Be sure not to block air intakes around appliances such as furnaces, to allow ample oxygen flow for proper burning.
Have your gas furnace checked by a qualified heating and cooling contractor on an annual basis. Clean or replace heating system air filters at least once a month. Check flues and chimney to make sure they're venting properly.

Be informed about carbon monoxide.
Carbon monoxide is odorless - yet it can be quite hazardous. Headache, dizziness, fatigue, excessive perspiration, and nausea are some of the many symptoms of poisoning from unburned fuel. If you suspect carbon monoxide poisoning, leave the building. Phone 911, the number of your local emergency response organization (fire or police department) or KPL at 1-800-794-4780, from another location.
If considering a carbon monoxide detector to help alert your family, look for a detector that meets these minimum standards – emits an audible alarm, is Underwriters Lab Approved and bears the AGA Blue Star Certificate seal. Be sure to follow the manufacturer's instructions for use and placement.

Teach your family well.
Let your children know what you're doing to make your home safe. Teach them the signs of possible gas leaks and carbon monoxide poisoning, and what they should do if they suspect either. Make sure they follow these other common sense, safety tips:
• Don't use a gas range or unvented space heater as a heating source in your home.
• Make sure the garage door is open before starting automobiles.
• Always start lawn mowers and snow blowers outside your garage.
• Never grill inside an enclosed porch or garage.

Look for us looking out for you.
Most KPL natural gas lines are underground. Trained KPL personnel conduct thorough and regular checks of our buried natural gas lines to ensure they are free of leaks. Before doing any digging, simply call us toll free at 1-800-DIG-SAFE (344-7233). We'll be happy to help by marking underground gas line locations at no charge – with a two day notice.

Call on us to help.
If you have questions, call 1-800-794-4780. We're here with answers. If you have concerns, we'll get them taken care of. After all, we're here to serve you. We're KPL. We're dedicated to making your life a little easier, and your home a safe place.

Fort Hays State to offer courses through Internet

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA, Kan. — Fort Hays State University will use the Internet and other technology to provide undergraduate courses to residents of Topeka and eastern Kansas next spring.

The decision was spurred by a recent action of the Kansas Board of Regents to allow six state universities to offer distance learning courses outside their traditional geographic boundaries.

"There are a lot of people who are just not able to pick up and move to a regents community or take courses at Washburn," said Edward Hammond, university president. Washburn University is in Topeka.

"Our distance learning technology gives us the flexibility of meeting people's educational needs when they want, at a place they want and the way they want," he said.

Students will complete the courses at their own pace using videotapes, the Internet and two-way interactive video.

"You could do it all through videotape if you wanted," Hammond said.

Hammond said the interactive technology is helpful when students have questions. He said students can e-mail questions to professors, and professors can respond with e-mail.

Regents rules still prohibit Fort Hays State from offering traditional classes in the territories of the other state universities.

Hammond said the 95-year-old school — the fastest growing of the regents universities with a fall enrollment of 5,616 — will offer a pilot program for those with at least 60 college or community college credit hours who want to finish a bachelor of general studies degree.

Additional courses and degree programs will be offered next fall.

Hammond said Fort Hays State's distance learning program isn't designed to take students away from Washburn, the University of Kansas or K-State. It was created to meet the specific needs of some students desiring to increase their skills to get or keep a job.

"It's designed to help Kansans be competitive," Hammond said.

Legislators debate control of center

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA, KAN. — Some members are not convinced the Legislature needs to approve quickly a bill designed to keep the University of Kansas Medical Center's hospital financially stable.

The bill would turn operation of the hospital over to a public authority with a board of directors, rather than have it under the direct control of state government. KU officials believe the change would allow the hospital to compete more effectively with private hospitals for patients.

KU Chancellor Robert Hemenway and medical center officials testified Wednesday during a meeting of the Legislative Budget Committee, which is reviewing the bill. Hemenway said legislators need to resolve their differences quickly.

But after the meeting, Rep. Henry Helgerson, D-Wichita, said, "There's no reason to run it through very quickly."

Both houses approved a version of the bill during the 1997 session, but a conference committee of three senators and three representatives could not reach an agreement. The bill will be before the conference committee when the 1998 session begins in January.

Hemenway said he would like the authority to assume control of the hospital by June 30. The authority would be similar to the one that operates the Kansas Turnpike.

The medical center has faced financial problems in recent years, as managed-care programs have become more prevalent, especially in the Kansas City metropolitan area. Managed care emphasizes home care over hospitalization.

But Helgerson and Rep. Melvin Neufeld, R-Ingalls, were skeptical Wednesday that the medical center's financial problems are more serious than those of other hospitals, particularly in rural areas.

Neufeld said the most crucial issue is the composition of the authority's board. House members want legislators, appointed by legislative leaders, as permanent members.

Neufeld said having legislators on the board ensures adequate oversight of hospital operations.

He said the medical center wants quick passage because, "the longer it hangs around, the more likely it is that there will be legislative oversight that means something."

Sen. Dave Kerr, R-Hutchinson, chairman of the Senate Ways and Means Committee, said he is puzzled by some House members' seeming lack of trust of the medical center.

"It seems to me they don't want to accept answers at face value," Kerr said.

Doctor convicted in fire deaths

ASSOCIATED PRESS

OLATHE, Kan. — A former doctor who was convicted in the fire deaths of two of her children has hired a new attorney, a possible prelude to a challenge to her conviction and sentence.

Debora Green, of Prairie Village, Kan., pleaded no contest in April 1996 and was convicted of two counts of first-degree murder in the deaths of her son, Tim Farrar, 13, and one of her two daughters, Kelly Farrar, 6.

A third child, Kate Farrar, then 10 years old, escaped through an upstairs window as fire ravaged the family's home in the Kansas City suburb of Prairie Village on Oct. 24, 1995.

In her no-contest pleas to murder, arson and attempted murder, Green did not admit setting the fatal fire or trying to kill her older daughter and her estranged husband but acknowledged the state had enough evidence to convict her.

She is now in the Topeka Correctional Facility and must serve at least 40 years before she becomes eligible for parole.

The plea limited Green's appeal options, but Kansas law allows prisoners to file other legal challenges even after exhausting their appeals.

Green's new attorney, Kurt P. Kerns, of Wichita, has contacted the lawyers who represented her earlier and has asked for a transcript of her proceedings in Johnson County District Court.

Kerns said Wednesday that he could not discuss any specific strategies until he had received all the records.

Johnson County District Attorney Paul Morrison, who prosecuted Green, said inmates often try to have convictions and sentences overturned by attacking the lawyers who represented them. Such actions are rarely successful, he said.

"Debora Green is not going to escape responsibility for her actions through this law," Morrison said.

Green's former attorney said he would not comment until a new action is filed.

Prosecutors have said Green, who is in her mid-40s, set the fire to hurt her husband, Dr. Michael Farrar, because he planned to divorce her. He was living apart from the family when the fire broke out.

Green was accused of putting a toxic derivative of castor beans in Farrar's food several times before the fire, making him ill and sending him to the hospital.

Farrar, a cardiologist, needed brain surgery to repair damage caused by the castor bean derivative.

JIAN CHEN, graduate student in economics, looks at photographs from the "Earth Angels: Migrant Children in America" series in the K-State Student Union Art Gallery on Thursday afternoon. Forty-one color photographs are featured in the display in the Union through Nov. 1.

▸ "EARTH ANGELS: MIGRANT CHILDREN in America" will be in the Union Gallery until Nov. 4. Gallery hours are 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday Admission is free.

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

The United States might be a nation of immigrants with a history riddled with people trying to explain themselves.

At times, the country has been good to its rural immigrants. At other times, especially during those glimpsed in "Earth Angels," an exhibition of photography by Nancy Buirski, it has been cruel.

Buirski, foreign photo editor for the New York Times, has organized a simple photo essay of contemporary rural migrant farmer life, an essay of rare emotion and humanity. The show closes Nov. 4.

The show is a stunning example of good photojournalism — a narrative photography that hardly needs, yet is strengthened, by the explanative panels accompanying it. And what subject matter could resonate more in Kansas, a state that is seeing a large influx of immigrants finding work in factories, fields and the beef industry?

It's interesting to note that Garden City and innumerable other south Kansas cities are seeing their schools and public institutions becoming representative of many cultures and backgrounds — particularly South Asian and Latin American.

There is a difference between these immigrant communities and those of migrant workers, as portrayed in Buirski's photos. Migrants have less time in one location before moving on to another harvest. Therefore, they are afforded even fewer luxuries, such as modern plumbing, heat, decent furniture and health care.

Migrant culture, although central to Kansas history since the state was settled by non-Native Americans in the 1800s, is no longer something Kansans can shrug off on California, Washington, Texas, New York and Florida, though Buirski's photographs were all taken in those states. In fact, these photos could be taken anywhere in the United States.

Just walking into a restaurant in Wichita and discovering the entire staff speaks better Spanish than English, one realizes the approaching diversity of Kansas. How are the two cultures colliding: seamlessly or wretchedly?

Of course, that's a difficult question to answer. But if Buirski's work is any indication, perhaps the latter is true. Kansas might not have the acres of migrant slum housing that the farm communities of central California shelter, but in that, we are the exception.

Having lived a good part of my life in central California, on many occasions I've seen the two communities, white and migrant Latino, intersect in both positive and negative ways.

Having a parent who taught English in a farm community school to immigrant children, both legal and illegal, helped me to realize the growing disparities of life in America.

While I spent my time learning computers and literature in high school, my migrant counterparts were staying in school only between harvests, learning rudimentary skills and facing a hard life of farm work or city poverty. At any time, their parents could shuffle them back to Mexico where last year's school lesson would soon be forgotten.

Buirski's photography only confirms the point. How many images of 16-year-olds picking crops does one need to see before grasping the cruelties of life?

And while my ancestors worked many years in Kansas wheat fields, they were working for themselves.

Thanks to massive government handouts of cheap, even free, land around the turn of the century, my ancestors owned their crops. How many migrant farmworkers can claim the same?

Viennese string quartet to bring awards, musical variety to McCain performance

JAMI NELSON
staff reporter

The Artis Quartet will transform McCain Auditorium into a concert hall of classical music at 8 p.m. Saturday.

The McCain performance will include works by Schubert, Mozart and Brahms. The quartet includes violinist Peter Schuhmayer, cellist Othmar Muller, violist Herbert Kefer and violinist Johannes Meissl.

"They're performing music of Viennese composers, and they are a Viennese quartet," said Corrie Graves, booking agent for Melvin Kaplan Inc., which represents the quartet. "I don't know of any other Viennese quartet that performs as well as they do. It's Viennese soul music."

Since its formation in 1980 in Vienna, Austria, the quartet has received international awards, including a Grand Prix du Disque, several Diapasons d'Or and recognition at the Evian and Cambridge competitions. The group has also recorded exclusively with Sony Classical since 1990.

In addition to its international awards, the quartet has traveled globally. In its 1996-97 tour, the group performed in Japan, Thailand, Berlin, and London. It has also played in Buenos Aires, Hawaii and Hong Kong.

This is not the first trip to the continental United States for the quartet. In November 1995, the musicians completed their first extensive U.S. tour. Now the quartet is coming to Manhattan from Grosse Pointe, Mich., and will travel to Los Angeles after its stop in Kansas.

David Frain, assistant director of McCain, said he expects this performance to attract a variety of people.

"As far as age, we'll see a wide variety," Frain said. "We certainly expect to see a lot of students."

Frain said members of freshman seminar classes are attending this performance for a class assignment.

The performance is sponsored by the Kansas Arts Commission, the National Endowment for the Arts and the K-State Fine Arts Fee.

To purchase tickets for the Artis Quartet, call 532-6428. Ticket prices are $16 for the general public, $14 for senior citizens and $8 for students.

Singers keeping busy throughout semester

CORBIN H. CRABLE
staff writer

The Department of Music is booming with activity this semester, said Gerald Polich, director of the Men's and Women's Glee Clubs and the K-State Singers.

The first concert of the semester for both groups was Oct. 10 in McCain Auditorium.

"Both the glee clubs are fairly well balanced as to voice parts," Polich said. "And the Women's Glee is larger than it has ever been."

The Men's Glee Club, established in 1888, performs 20 times on average during the school year. In the past few years the group has performed in national seminars at Harvard University, Wisconsin and Washington. The Men's Glee Club even made a pilgrimage to Mexico.

Polich said the men have been kept busy thus far. The Men's Glee Club sang at a Royals game Sept. 18 and also sang at four area high schools in the same day. Earlier this month, the K-State Men's and Women's Glee Clubs sang with the University of Nebraska's Men's and Women's Glee Clubs in a concert in Lincoln, Neb.

This year the men have been invited to sing at a national convention of the Intercollegiate Men's Chorus April 16-19 at Morehouse College in Atlanta.

Alcohol ban not a response to incidents at other schools

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The University of Missouri-Kansas City has banned alcohol from its four fraternity houses, but a school official said the four chapters aren't being punished.

The move also was not a response to recent alcohol-related problems affecting fraternities at two other schools in Missouri, said Ernie Stufflebean, student services coordinator at the university's Student Life Office.

"We really started seriously thinking about this in the week before school started, but it actually goes back to February, when we went to the national conference on greek affairs," Stufflebean said.

He said two houses — Lambda Chi Alpha and Sigma Phi Epsilon — had bans in place a week before the school's policy took effect Monday.

The schools' three sororities have always had alcohol-free chapter houses, Stufflebean said.

The fraternities' endorsements of university policy weren't without dissent, Lambda Chi Alpha president Eric Baker said, but they're part of a trend that has seen increased pressure on fraternities to crack down on alcohol abuse.

"A couple of guys who live in the house were concerned about it because they're 21, and they won't be allowed to drink in the house," Baker said. "But we decided if the university was going to do it, we were going to support it."

Beta Theta Pi members at the University of Missouri-Columbia didn't have much choice but to ban alcohol last week. The chapter had faced sanctions from the school and its own national organization after an incident last month involving a drunken pledge.

The pledge, who chapter officials admitted had been drinking at the fraternity house, was hospitalized for two days after being found injured on campus. He said he did not remember how he got hurt.

Also last week, the Delta Chi chapter at Southwest Missouri State University had its social functions suspended after its third citation on charges of providing alcohol to minors.

Fraternities aren't as prominent at the University of Missouri-Kansas City, where Stufflebean estimated only 300 of the school's 10,000 students are members of national fraternities and sororities. Nor are the living arrangements like those at many other schools, where most of a fraternity's members live in-house.

"These are not what you would call traditional fraternity houses," Stufflebean said.

"The largest one is the Beta Theta Pi house, and only 18 students live there. The others are in residential areas, and only five or so people live in each one.," he said.

Activities outside the chapter houses might involve alcohol, but Baker said fraternities still must comply with their national organization's restrictions.

"The guidelines we have to follow from our nationals are actually stricter than what the university had before," Baker said. "We can't furnish alcohol, and we're not allowed to charge money for an event where there's alcohol present.

"We have to have a certain percentage of our chapter as sober party monitors, and we've rented out buses before to keep people from drinking and driving."

West Virginia judge pleads no contest, resigns in bizarre nose-biting incident

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ST. MARYS, W.Va. — A judge accused of biting a defendant's nose in his courtroom pleaded no contest to battery and resigned Thursday.

Joseph Troisi, a 47-year-old judge on the Pleasants County Circuit Court, could get up to a year in jail and a $500 fine for the alleged attack June 26 against Bill Witten, 29. A sentencing hearing was set for Nov. 26.

Troisi still faces federal civil rights charges carrying up to 10 years in prison.

"It once again proves that no matter who you are, you're not above the law," said Witten's father, Ray Witten.

Troisi was accused of stepping down from the bench, taking off his robe and confronting Witten after the defendant cursed at the judge while being led out of the courtroom. Afterward, witnesses said, Troisi returned to the bench as if nothing happened.

> "Halloween seems to be the most appropriate day for such a strange and bizarre case as this."
> • Ray Witten
> father of alleged nose-bite attack victim

Troisi claimed he did not intend to bite Witten. Witten suffered a bruise on the tip of his nose.

The incident occurred after a hearing at which Troisi refused to reduce Witten's $40,000 bail while the defendant appealed his sentence for grand larceny and illegally entering a business. A half-dozen people in the courtroom saw the incident.

A report prepared for the state Supreme Court said Troisi had a longstanding inability to control his temper on the bench.

Troisi lost his temper 19 times in the past two years, the report said.

Troisi's arraignment on the federal charges is scheduled for Oct. 31.

"Halloween seems to be the most appropriate day for such a strange and bizarre case as this," Ray Witten said.

Genealogical society to provide workshop to probe family history

HANG NGUYEN
staff writer

Members of the Riley County Genealogical Society are having their 35th Annual Workshop from 8 a.m. to 4 p.m. Saturday in Pottorf Hall at CiCo Park. Admission is $20 and registration begins at 7:45 a.m.

In 1961, a group of interested people in the community, led by Grace Woldt, founded the Riley County Genealogical Society. It was chartered in 1963.

There are now 302 members internationally. One hundred fifty of those members are from the Manhattan area. The society's main source of funding is membership dues.

Genealogy is the study of family histories.

"Family history is important because it keeps families together," said Jane Brown, president of the Riley County Genealogical Society. "As we live in such a separate and mobile society, it draws us back together and makes us proud, and pride is what we need to instill in our youth."

Brown said the workshop has always been a tremendous success.

"The purpose of the workshop is to bring professional genealogy speakers into our community and help those who want to research their family history," Brown said.

There's another purpose for this year's workshop.

"The society is trying to raise money for the expansion of the historic Platt House," she said. "We have already collected between $12,000 and $15,000 from members and area businesses. We need $50,000 for the expansion. We hope to break ground for the new addition before the first of the year."

The 35th Annual Workshop will also highlight three speakers: Mary Jane McIntire, a professional genealogist for 22 years; Ruth Keys Clark, avid genealogist for 19 years; and Terry Van Meter, director of U.S. Calvary Museum, Fort Riley and U.S. Infantry Museum.

Clark's topic will be "Heraldry and the College of Arms."

"Every family had a coat of arms," Brown said. "She's going to talk about the divisions and meanings of different ones and teach people how to research their own family's coat of arms."

For people whose ancestors were involved with the military, Van Meter will discuss "Finding Your Ancestors Using Government and Military Records."

Vendors will also be at the workshop to sell genealogical books, supplies and archival materials, Bessie Wray, workshop chairwoman and member, said.

She said there will be someone there to reproduce old photographs so people can get them the same day.

The workshop is open to the public. The admission fee includes activities, lunch and a program.

"Anyone interested in doing research on their family history should come to the workshop. It starts out as a hobby, but it's a hobby that becomes your life," Wray said.

CHOIR

The Women's Glee Club, formed in 1899, performs six times per year and is made up of 60 women.

Emilie Lunsford, senior in humanities, is both the president of Women's Glee Club and the alto section leader of the group. Lunsford acknowledged that choir is a big commitment for all members, especially the officers.

"My commitment to this choir is tremendous," Lunsford said. "It has to be because I have to take care of a lot of business with the women that Mr. Polich doesn't have time to do, so I have to commit a lot of time, which I don't mind a bit."

However, the benefits of being in choir, Lunsford added, are many.

"There's a feeling of belonging to something that constantly works toward a common goal," she said. "You learn to cooperate with 20 to 30 people at a time. It's tough sometimes, but we are all friends and have a good time, which is the biggest benefit."

Another benefit is the sound of a practiced harmony in performances.

"I love that feeling when you hit all the right notes and the harmonies are perfect," Lunsford said. "If it's something that turns out totally perfect, I tend to get shivers up and down my spine."

The K-State Singers, a show choir that specializes in jazz, has the heaviest performance schedule, with 30 to 45 performances per year. Some of these performances have been concerts, building dedications, USO Department of Defense and tours to Europe and Asia. The Singers have also performed at Worlds Fairs in Vancouver, British Columbia; New Orleans; and Knoxville, Tenn.

Phil Garrison, junior in management and manager of the K-State Singers, said membership in K-State Singers requires not only a background in vocal music, but dance as well, because most of the pieces are choreographed.

Garrison, who spends five to 10 hours per week putting shows together for the group, said performing is the best part about being involved in the group.

"Stepping on stage allows you to enter a different world for 45 minutes to an hour," he said. "You become a different person."

K-State Singers Jimi Pauls, senior in political science, and Rebecca Lewis, junior in advertising, agreed.

"I like to think that I am pleasing others when I perform," Lewis said.

Pauls added that it is important to enjoy singing, even when the rigorous rehearsal schedule is a source of stress.

"With rehearsal every day, you have to really enjoy what you're doing to make it worthwhile," Pauls said.

Polich faces the task of choosing music that will appeal to both his students and audiences.

"It's always a challenge to find interesting music to sing," he said.

Pauls said after college opportunities to sing will become more scarce and said she will enjoy singing for as long as she can.

"I don't ever plan to quit singing, but the opportunities to perform will certainly be harder to find once I'm out of college," she said.

Garrison said he will treasure the moments he has spent with the choir.

"This is my last opportunity at singing in a great choir," he said, "so I'm trying to savor every minute."

The choirs' next big performance will be their Christmas concert, scheduled for Dec. 14.

What else happened in Student Senate?

BILL 97/98/36 PASSED 50-4. This bill added a student-body plebiscite question to the stadium expansion referendum ballot on November 17 and 18. The question asks whether students prefer K-State's traditional letter-grading system, a plus system or a plus-minus system.

BILL 97/98/41 PASSED 54-0. This bill created a reserve account to save surplus academic competition teams' funds for future use.

BILL 97/98/38 PASSED 54-0. This bill allocated $1,590 (the full amount requested) to Business Case competition teams for fiscal year 1998.

BILL 97/98/39 PASSED 54-0. This bill allocated 8,950 (the full amount requested) to the Speech Unlimited competition team for fiscal year 1998.

BILL 97/98/28 PASSED 54-0. This bill moved unspent funds from the FONE Crisis Center, Disabled Student Services and Women's Resource Center back to the Student Governing Association Reserves for Contingencies Account. A total of $41.44 was transferred.

BILL 97/98/29 PASSED 54-0. This bill revised voter qualifications for general elections and clarified current election codes. Students enrolled in at least one credit hour at the main campus of K-State are now eligible to vote in elections.

BILL 97/98/34 PASSED 54-0. This bill moved unspent funds from various college councils back to the Student Governing Association Reserves for Contingencies Account. A total of $12,129.53 was transferred.

determine where a possible fee would be set.

"I would hope that if the vote comes back and the majority of students voted for one option, that you would take the bill that we give to you (out of Privilege Fee Committee) and vote it in by unanimous consent. That will be what the students have said that they want," Otto said.

After debate and six amendments, the final bill contained numerous differences from the original that was introduced by Privilege Fee Committee. One key amendment expanded the length of the election from one day to two.

Governmental Relations Committee Chair Patrick Carney, who proposed the amendment, said it will help gather even more student opinion.

"We've talked a great deal about wanting to get as many students involved as absolutely possible. We're talking about a good deal of money coming out of the pockets of students every year. I believe we should offer the students of this university more of an opportunity than just a Tuesday to come in and register their vote," Carney said.

Other amendments changed the wording of the bill to make the question — and how Student Senate will deal with the election results — more specific.

Graduate Senator Chris Avila's change added a clause that considers the referendum failed if it does not receive 60 percent of the vote. In his debate, Avila said other referendum votes, such as the Union expansion, have received less than the majority but were approved by Senate, nevertheless.

Avila said the goal of his referendum was to keep that from happening again.

"I've been here long enough to see a referendum pass by 59.2 percent and still be called a majority opinion. Now we have a Union project," Avila said. "This makes sure that a majority is needed."

Only one of the six proposed amendments failed. Arts and Sciences Senator Greg Cleaver objected to the wording because under the original bill, students who voted against the referendum were not allowed to choose which privilege fee they would prefer if a fee is created.

Cleaver said he disagreed with calling the question's results official student opinion without allowing all students to vote on it.

"When that plebiscite comes before this body, that plebiscite will have faulty information in it. That plebiscite will illustrate the official opinion of the student body when not all students have been allowed to vote," Cleaver said.

Later, Faculty Representative to Senate Bill Muir amended the bill to include the word "question" instead of "plebiscite." The change passed by unanimous consent.

Before the bill was passed, Agriculture Senator Aaron Truax debated against it, saying the voice of the minority should be heard before a positive vote for a privilege fee forces all students to pay. Truax is a member of Privilege Fee Committee, which authored the bill.

"Right now, I don't think that we should make it mandatory that every student on this campus pay for a fee that is a want of certain people on this campus — 10,000 at most. I don't in any way want to stop student opinion, but I will stand up for those who cannot stand up for themselves," he said.

Truax said senators should listen to the voices of all students who will pay the fee — not just football fans.

"Contrary to popular belief, it doesn't go — God, Snyder, Wefald, Clinton. It goes — God, taxpayers, Snyder, Wefald, Clinton. The taxpayers are we, the students, who will be paying the fee if it passes the referendum," he said.

STOCKS

moil.

U.S. Treasury bonds and bills, the most liquid and secure of investments, were snapped up by global investors looking for a haven for the money yanked out of stocks.

Yields on the 30-year U.S. Treasury bond, an important indicator of the cost of borrowing, plunged to 6.30 percent by late Thursday from 6.42 percent late Wednesday.

The rout in Hong Kong occurred after the government, in a move to support its currency, began aggressively selling U.S. dollars and buying Hong Kong dollars. It also cut off a cheap source of credit for banks.

Interest rates soared. The interest on overnight loans between banks shot up to 300 percent from 7 percent Wednesday, sparking fears that banks will raise their prime lending rates today, undermining Hong Kong businesses and the real estate market.

The defense of the Hong Kong dollar was a rude surprise to currency and stock traders, who had speculated that the government, under pressure from Hong Kong manufacturers to stay competitive, would instead devalue the currency by letting it freely trade as other Asian governments have recently done.

Hong Kong stocks were also battered as several high-profile investment funds, reacting to lowered growth expectations for the Asian economy, indiscriminately dumped Asian stocks. Thailand, Malaysia, Indonesia and the Philippines have been under economic stress for months and have recently devalued their currencies.

Speculators have been selling the currencies of those countries since July.

On Thursday, the stock selling was most prominent in the shares of international companies that rely heavily on sales in Asia.

Among issues under pressure in the United States were technology companies that have looked to Asia's economic growth for new sales and airlines that depend on traffic to Asia.

cally is higher than in other areas. The average student debt in Massachusetts is $20,000.

Most of the students surveyed said they had incomes of $20,000 to $30,000 a year.

"The students who are hurt the most are those who went to higher-cost institutions and studied fields that haven't given them the kinds of wages they need," Diane Saunders, Nellie Mae's vice president of public affairs said. "And these pressures are affecting the way they make other decisions about their careers and their lives," she said.

An increasing number of students are putting off such things as buying a car or a house, or moving out of their parents' house, the study found. Some graduates are working outside their fields to make enough money to pay off their debts.

Bridget McDonald, 24, graduated from Boston College in 1995 with a degree in elementary education, and about $20,000 in student loans.

She told the Globe she can't find an education job that would pay enough for her to pay her bills, including $285 a month in loans. She works as an administrative assistant at an insurance company and wonders whether she can afford to go to graduate school.

"I'm not in the career I want to be in, and that's the biggest effect my loans have on me right now," she said.

The collision comes weeks after Defense Secretary William Cohen ordered all branches of the military to have a 24-hour safety stand-down and review their training procedures after a rash of air crashes.

The series of air crashes started Sept. 13 when an Air Force C-141 transport plane crashed off the coast of Africa after apparently colliding with another aircraft. The next day, an F-117A stealth fighter broke up in flight at an air show in Maryland.

The day after that, a Navy F-18 went down in Oman and a Marine Corps F-18 crashed off North Carolina. Two planes from the New Jersey Air National Guard also collided off the New Jersey coast in September.

Anderson expansion meeting announced

▶ Is this a good thing?
A public informational meeting about the Anderson Avenue Expansion Project will be at 6 p.m. Nov. 13 in Union 212.

BENJAMIN YODER
campus government editor

The Governmental Relations Committee tabled a resolution supporting the expansion of Anderson Avenue Sunday.

The decision was made following the announcement of a fourth informational meeting scheduled for 6 p.m. Nov. 13 in Union 212. Jack Messer, Manhattan city engineer, said the meeting is intended to inform K-State students and Manhattan residents about the expansion, a $7-million project scheduled to begin in early 1999.

However, Messer said it was too late in the planning process to significantly change the plans. He said 80 percent of the plans are completed and have been sent to the Kansas Department of Transportation. The plans will be 95 percent complete by December, and the bidding process will begin soon after.

"At this point in the project, we are about nine months into the project," Messer said.

Prior to the announcement, Messer and Dave MacFarland, associate professor of journalism and member of Anderson Widening Area Residents' Enclave, a citizens' awareness group against the project, presented their differing opinions of the expansion.

Three public meetings to inform the public about the expansion have occurred since the beginning of the year, and Messer said the two most important issues expressed during meetings were vehicular safety and relieving traffic congestion.

"We have attempted to be up front with people that this was going to be a project of great magnitude," Messer said.

The project will widen Anderson Avenue from 16th Street to Sunset Avenue. A left-turn lane will stretch the length of the project and a northbound right-turning lane will be added to Anderson Avenue at Denison Avenue. One-hundred eighty trees will also be removed because of construction.

The widening will allow traffic to move more smoothly because stop lights will be computer timed, Messer said. He said it would create a "platoon system" designed to allow groups of automobiles to get green lights.

If pedestrians want to cross the street, Messer said crosswalk buttons located at most intersections would change traffic lights, but only if a "platoon" was not approaching the intersection.

Blizzard hits plain states first

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DENVER — Stranded motorists, single-digit temperatures and 6-foot snow drifts were left behind Sunday as the season's first blizzard passed through, shutting down much of the western Plains.

The State Patrol barred non-emergency travel along some 300 miles of the Front Range, from Wyoming to New Mexico. A 125-mile stretch of Interstate 80 in Nebraska was closed, along with roads in Wyoming, Kansas and New Mexico.

The snow finally tapered off Saturday night. It was the worst snowstorm in Denver in 28 years, with 22 inches by Saturday evening surpassing the 16 inches recorded in 1969.

"Fortunately I don't know of any deaths," said Gov. Roy Romer, who ordered the National Guard to rescue stranded motorists. "But we have our Victor Morales, the first Hispanic from Texas to win a prominent party nomination for Senate elections, spoke Friday for Hispanic Heritage Month and discussed his recent announcement to run for the House of Representatives.

MAKING HIS POINT

STORY BY SARA MARTIN • PHOTOS BY CLIF PALMBERG

VICTOR MORALES delivers the keynote address for Hispanic Heritage Month Friday afternoon in Forum Hall. Morales ran against Phil Gramm for U.S. Senate in 1996 in Texas.

Victor Morales said he was tired of sitting back and allowing bad politicians to propose the wrong solutions to problems they didn't care about. So, this Democratic high school government teacher ran against Phil Gramm in the 1996 Senate race. He was the first Hispanic to win a major party nomination in Texas.

Morales delivered the keynote address for Hispanic Heritage Month Friday. He discussed his recent announcement to resign from teaching to run for the House of Representatives and his motivations for his previous campaign.

"I thought to myself 'I don't know how much impact I'm going to have, but I've got to try,'" he said.

His wife was hesitant at first, he said. However, her faith in him was strong. She supported his decision although his absence from teaching cost his family $40,000 and their life savings.

Morales refused to accept Political Action Committee money. He campaigned in his white pickup truck and traveled 80,000 miles through Texas, meeting people and relying on personal donations.

"There were always people along the way caring for me," he said. "There were people there for me constantly, giving me dinner or a place to stay. I figure if you don't have friends, make some."

The media often accused Morales of failing to take a stand on issues, he said. Morales, a staunch supporter of Head Start programs, education, Pell grants, better border patrol and being fiscally sound, said his grass-roots campaign style allowed people to relate better to him than Gramm.

"I remember this man once, who, after talking to me said, 'Victor, I'm a Republican, but I'm going to vote for you because I believe in what you're doing.'" Morales said. "People knew that I was telling the truth and that I don't have to dance for anyone, no matter what was said about me."

Math department faces staff shortage

KRIS ROBL
staff reporter

A shortage of faculty members could become a serious problem for the math department next year if a hiring freeze is not lifted.

The math department has sustained the death of one faculty member, and two faculty members are taking a leave of absence.

"Right now we have a couple of instructors on leave to do research," Andrew Bennett, associate professor of mathematics, said.

Bennett said that having faculty members take a leave of absence to do research is part of having a successful math program.

"The real shortage will be felt next year," David Yetter, associate professor of mathematics, said. "There's a possibility that we could be short about five to eight faculty members."

Yetter said the shortage could be attributed to a few faculty members that might be taking a sabbatical or leave of absence next year. He also said that some faculty members might be looking at other universities for positions.

He said when faculty members go on a sabbatical or a leave of absence they are paid half of their regular salary or not paid at

Counseling Services celebrates 50 years

KRISTIN BOYD
staff reporter

During a time when World War II veterans were returning to college, K-State's Counseling Services were there to help assist them.

University Counseling Services has been assisting students since 1946. This past year marked 50 years of service that the Counseling Services has provided for students.

In the past, the Counseling Services focused on issues such as teaching students study skills and helping students choose a major.

Today, the Counseling Services help students cope with stress and anxiety, situational problems, family issues, depression and other common problems that face college students.

"We have a full-range counseling service. We deal with anything from personal issues to relationships," Fred Newton, director of the Counseling Services, said.

In recent years, the Counseling Services has been using a device known has biofeedback. This is the computerized monitoring of body responses.

It allows students to become aware of changes in his or her physiological and emotional levels of arousal.

Newton said things have changed a lot from the past with more technology like computers and biofeedback around.

In a survey conducted by Counseling Services, 37 percent to 40 percent of the seniors surveyed had used the Counseling Services sometime or another in their four years at K-State.

Newton said students who usually have good grades have used their services.

"We have had trouble getting the average students who are just getting by to take advantage of our services," Newton said.

"I have never had to use the Counseling Services, but it is nice to know that it is there if I ever need it," Ali Davis, junior in landscape architecture, said.

Saturday's inclement weather did not discourage the 100 volunteers working for "Make A Difference Day" in Manhattan.

Sixteen volunteer groups were scheduled to complete projects, which included planting trees around schools, tearing down fences and buildings, picking up trash and working at Sunset Zoological Park. Some projects were postponed due to rain.

"I was surprised to see such a crowd on such a dark and dreary day," Mike Kearns, one of the event coordinators, said.

This is the first year that Manhattan has participated in the nationwide event, which is sponsored by the Points of Light Foundation and the USA WEEKEND magazine.

Locally, Youth as Resources and the Regional Prevention Center of Northeast Kansas organized the event. Youth As Resources is a nonprofit organization that funds civic projects for volunteers ages 8 to 21.

The day's projects are entered in the national competition. If the Manhattan project is chosen as a national honoree, it could receive some charitable awards.

"By participating today, we become eligible to receive $2,000 that we can donate to a charity of our choice," said Jennifer Unruh, event coordinator from the Regional Prevention Center.

"It's really inspiring to see you all come out today. This is one of the nation's largest days of caring," she said.

To kick off the event, volunteers met at Bramlage Coliseum. The K-State women's basketball team took time out of practice to show its support of the event.

"I'm one of those people that really believes one person can make a difference," Coach Deb Patterson said. "When we get this many people together, think of all the difference we can make.

"It really does make a difference whether you're planting trees or picking up trash. Let's just all bind together, help each other," she said.

To help with the event, the women's basketball team took refreshments to the volunteer sites throughout the day.

The day attracted a variety of volunteers: college students, children, parents and community members.

'Cop-a-Buzz' demonstration ends after participant is hospitalized

AKRON, Ohio — The "Cop-a-Buzz" demonstration on the dangers of drinking has been scrapped at the University of Akron after a student volunteer was hospitalized for drinking too much vodka.

University officials said Friday that they will find another way to observe Alcohol Awareness Week.

David Reynolds, 24, a civil engineering major, was hospitalized Wednesday night after drinking so much vodka that he became falling-down drunk. He was released the next day.

Reynolds and two other student volunteers were supposed to drink just enough to hit a blood alcohol level of 0.08 percent, slightly below the 0.10 percent limit for driving in Ohio, and then perform a sobriety test.

The demonstration was intended to show how even small amounts of alcohol can hamper motor skills. By the time police arrived, Reynolds was slumped and having trouble walking.

No one was able to say how much Reynolds drank. Police didn't check his blood-alcohol level before he went to the hospital.

"It was never the intention of the program to get anyone drunk," said David Stephen, university director of residence life and housing.

Barkley arrested after bar scuffle

ORLANDO, Fla. — Charles Barkley was arrested early Sunday for hurling a bar patron through a window after the man tossed a glass of ice at him.

Police said the Houston Rockets star told the victim as he lay bleeding on the ground: "You got what you deserve. You don't respect me. I hope you're hurt."

The 20-year-old patron, Jorge Lugo, was treated at a hospital for a minor laceration to his upper right arm.

Barkley was charged with aggravated battery and resisting arrest without violence, police said. He was jailed for five hours before being released on $6,000 bond.

Barkley told police that Lugo threw a glass of ice at him and three women who were sitting at his table. Barkley chased Lugo to the front of the bar, where an off-duty officer tried to intervene. But Barkley picked up Lugo and threw him through the window.

Barkley, who was in town for an exhibition game against the Orlando Magic, was not at practice Sunday morning but was expected to play Sunday night.

Rockets spokesman Tim Frank said team officials would discuss the fight with Barkley before deciding what to do.

Men charged with turtle trading

TOPEKA — Pssst! Hey, buddy, wanna buy a slightly used turtle?

Don't laugh. There's big money in the illicit turtle trade, and Kansas' official state reptile, the ornate box turtle, is right in the middle of it.

On Friday, federal prosecutors announced that two men had been indicted on charges of buying and selling more than 1,000 of the small, colorful reptiles.

Daniel Newton, 44, of Elk City, Kan., was charged with two counts of transporting and selling 837 box turtles in interstate commerce. Terry Luke Stevens, 42, of Thibodaux, La., is charged with three counts of receiving, acquiring and purchasing numerous snakes and 175 box turtles that had been caught in Kansas.

Box turtles, their dark shells marked by yellow and orange-yellow lines, are no big deal in Kansas, where they're often seen munching on backyard gardens or trying to cross busy highways. But they can fetch up to $300 each in Europe or Japan, a reptile expert said.

Police: Alleged drug dealer sent marijuana to laundry by mistake

VERO BEACH, Fla. — A marijuana dealer who police said took the wrong bag to the laundry was arrested after a worker found 3 pounds of marijuana instead of clothing inside.

Police said they seized 80 pot plants and discovered an elaborate indoor growing operation at the home of David Snyder, who was arrested Friday on drug charges.

Snyder, 37, is charged with cultivation of marijuana, possession of more than 20 grams of marijuana, possession of drug paraphernalia and possession of marijuana with the intent to sell. He was being held at the county jail Saturday evening on $12,000 bond.

When they searched Snyder's house, detectives found about $80,000 worth of plants and more than 8 pounds of marijuana tucked away in dresser drawers and garbage bags, police said.

March shows black women's solidarity

ASSOCIATED PRESS

PHILADELPHIA — Hundreds of thousands of black women stood shoulder to shoulder at the Million Woman March on Saturday, showing their solidarity and drawing attention to issues they believe mainstream groups ignore.

"Oh my gosh. So many. So many," JoAnne Royster of Arlington, Va., said in a hushed tone as she looked out at the crowd of black women.

By train, car, plane and hundreds of buses, black women answered the call of the grass-roots organizers, who estimated 2.1 million people filled a mile-long avenue in early afternoon. Estimates made by police officers ranged from 300,000 to 1 million.

"To the women of the United States, to African-American women, I say 'amandla,'" Winnie Madikizela-Mandela told the cheering crowd, using the "power" slogan from the fight for black rights in South Africa. "The power of your call invokes your Africanism and mine.

"We have a shared destiny, a shared responsibility, to save the world from those who attempt to destroy it."

The speech by Madikizela-Mandela, former wife of South African President Nelson Mandela, came at a rally at the end of the seven-hour program.

"After today, we will never be the same," said Rep. Maxine Waters, D-Calif. "America, please be placed on notice: We know who we are. We know what kind of power we have. We will act on that power."

Khadijah Farrakhan, wife of Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan, noted the gathering was inspired by her husband's Million Man March in Washington, D.C., two years ago.

"A nation can rise no higher than its women. We focus on women but cannot lose sight that we must rise as a family. Men, women and children," she said.

The march provided a forum for issues that many blacks feel some women's groups do not focus on. Among them were human rights abuses against blacks, the start of independent black schools and a demand for an investigation into allegations of CIA involvement in the crack trade in black neighborhoods.

"I feel like I belong to a powerful bloc," said Roxanne Browne, 34, of Boston.

Tanya Heard, 26, of Chicago said, "I'm getting a warm feeling seeing all these sisters."

The president of the National Organization of Women said last week there are similarities between the marchers' agenda and that of her group.

"We are all talking about women's health, education and violence in homes," Patricia Ireland said. "On our national agenda, the issue of women in prisons may not be as visible as the reproductive health issue, but it's not being ignored."

On Saturday, march founder Phile Chionesu stressed the ongoing community involvement and cooperation she wanted the march to initiate.

"This is a new day. Prepare yourselves. We are taking back our neighborhoods," said Chionesu, a community activist whose insistence on a grass-roots approach to organizing the march prompted controversy.

Organizers avoided usual channels for publicizing important events, such as courting the mainstream media and soliciting corporate donations. Instead, they relied upon word of mouth, the Internet and the black media.

For Margie Armstrong, a custodian at the University of Michigan, a feeling of solidarity developed even before she reached Philadelphia. Armstrong became mired in a traffic jam on the Pennsylvania Turnpike amid cars filled with black women.

"Everyone was saying, 'Hi, sister,'" said Armstrong, 53. "It was great."

The march started with a procession beginning at 7 a.m. near the Liberty Bell and traveling two miles to a stage at the Philadelphia Museum of Art. After light rainfall in the morning, clouds lingered all day.

Men from the Nation of Islam in bowler hats, bow ties and long black coats provided security around the stage area.

Signs proclaimed "I am one in a million" and "Black Women: No more AIDS, abuse, addiction." Women clamored to buy buttons, T-shirts, hats and flags emblazoned with march logos.

Students to contribute to alumni center plans

KRISTIN BOYD
staff reporter

Future K-State alumni from the College of Architecture are getting the chance to contribute their design concepts of the alumni center to be built on campus.

In their studios, fifth-year architecture students were given an assignment to propose plans and designs for the new building for the K-State Alumni Association. The new alumni center will be built south of Memorial Stadium.

Kim Murphy, senior in architecture, said students were assigned to come up with the models, plans and perspective drawings for the new building and to use limestone in their designs.

"This has been a big project for us. We have been working pretty much since the beginning of the semester on it," Murphy said.

Murphy also said students were given a program list of what the building should entail. This included things such as a ballroom, library, kitchen and cafe.

The students' designs will be a part of this year's Bayer Stone competition.

Their works will be judged by a group of jurors Wednesday at McCain Auditorium. The winners of the competition will then be announced at a reception at 5 p.m.

Because none of the students were licensed architects, their designs will actually be used by the Alumni Association.

"We are hoping to be able to give some insight to what the building could be. This is also a good chance for people to see what we are doing and how we are contributing on campus," Murphy said.

Brad Sidener, director of finance for the Alumni Association, said the Alumni Association was happy to get student involvement on the project.

"We are very excited to see the different ideas from a student perspective. We are hoping to be able to pull some ideas from their designs," Sidener said.

The students' works will be on display Wednesday at McCain for the public to view.

Part of Durland named after dean

COLE EHMKE
staff reporter

A dedication ceremony Friday honored a former K-State College of Engineering dean by naming phase II of Durland Hall for him.

Rathbone Hall is named for Donald E. Rathbone, who retired in June and was dean of the college since 1973.

During his 24 years, Rathbone oversaw the development of the college — from an instructional operation producing professionals and then expanding into research activities, grant expansion, graduate work and, in recent years, spinning off into economic development activities, University Provost, James Coffman said, but the students remained utmost.

"Don never lost sight of the central reason of the college's existence, and that is the undergraduate professional engineering student," Coffman, said.

Gary Edwards, the chair of the college's Engineering Advisory Council, also praised Rathbone's accomplishments.

"We have watched Don transform Kansas State's engineering program into one of the top programs in America."

Rathbone's career was filled with success and milestones, Edwards said, and he gave several examples.

- Undergraduate enrollment increased from less than 1,000 to more than 2,500 — larger than the two other Kansas engineering schools combined.
- Graduate enrollment increased from 150 to 500.
- Research grants increased from $500,000 dollars to more than $20 million.
- Five new degree programs were added, including computer science and information systems.
- The college now has a million dollar-plus scholarship program.

President Jon Wefald said Rathbone's work is impossible to ignore.

"No matter how you look at it, this college is better today by far than it was in 1973," Wefald said.

Rathbone said the college was fortunate to have faculty committed to teaching and to students and productive in research. He also said the student body was a truly outstanding group of young people. He added that the three phases of the engineering complex make K-State's engineering program second to none nationally for a college of K-State's size.

"This is a very humbling and overwhelming experience for me," he said. "I don't know how I can respond emotionally. I am obviously deeply honored and most appreciative of the recognition."

Rathbone continues to work as the part-time director of Land Management and Training.

Rathbone Hall was phase II of the engineering complex and built in 1983. It includes administrative offices, the LeRoy Pasley lecture hall, the Thomas F. Skinner video classroom and a remote computing center.

Phase I is Durland Hall, completed in 1976. Phase III is yet to be started but will have a multimedia lecture hall and a high-tech electronic library. Rathbone helped raise $11 million for the planned addition, as well as $33 million for the recent Essential Edge Campaign. To recognize his role in planning phases I and II, the Kansas Board of Regents approved Wefald's request to name phase II after Rathbone.

Albright promises talk on human rights

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Chinese President Jiang Zemin will get a full picture of how Americans feel about China's human rights record, both from protest demonstrations outside and tough talk inside the White House, Madeleine Albright said Sunday.

Jiang

The secretary of state also made it clear that while human rights are just one aspect of increasingly important ties between the U.S. and China, "We will never have a completely normal relationship with them until they have a better human rights policy."

Zemin, who arrived Sunday in Honolulu to begin the first U.S. visit by a Chinese leader in a dozen years, is expected to face protest rallies at each of his stops in Williamsburg, Va.; Washington, Philadelphia, New York, Boston and Los Angeles.

Albright

Christian groups were to kick off the demonstrations Sunday with a prayer vigil across from the White House to protest religious persecution in China and the country's abortion policies.

Speaking of the historic locales Jiang is visiting in the United States, Albright said on NBC's "Meet the Press" that Zemin "will not have a totally fuzzy time at these places. I think that it is important for him, actually, to see where our liberty came from."

"Everywhere he goes in the United States, President Jiang Zemin is going to meet with protesters. He's going to see and hear American voices on this. I can't think of anything better than that," Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., said on CNN's "Late Edition."

Zemin, who rose to power in the Chinese Communist Party hierarchy in the wake of the 1989 Tiananmen crackdown, meets Clinton Wednesday for talks expected to cover the issues of trade, weapons proliferation, Taiwan, drug trafficking and the environment rights.

"The important part here for us is to engage with China but not endorse everything that they're doing," Albright said.

She said substantial progress has been made toward an agreement where China would pledge not to

Movie monopoly not to be taken with a grain of popcorn salt

In a city where people claim there is nothing to do, one more thing is slowly being removed from the list.

A change in policies made by Carmike Cinemas, the Arkansas-based owner of all Manhattan's movie theaters, is making sure its primary audience is unable and unwilling to go to the movies.

During the summer, the new owners raised prices, removed all student and military discounts from the theaters of a student/military town and then sat back to watch the money roll in.

Not to get nostalgic over something that was less than 10 years ago, but there was a time when a $5 bill would not just get you a great movie, but a bucket of popcorn and maybe a Coke, too. Today, if you want to take a date to a movie, you'd better have a credit card.

The new prices could be understandable because the theaters have needed improvements for a while. For one, the variety of movies has been lacking for years. If you are not interested in the top 10 movies as ranked by pre-pubescents, then you are out of luck.

Of all of 1997's Oscar nominees for best picture, Manhattan theaters had only shown one. Variety has not changed yet, though. If you are looking for an independently made, critically acclaimed film, you are looking at a one- to two-hour drive.

Another needed addition is movies after 9:45 p.m. Midnight showings are among the most popular in other college towns. However, that's not changing anytime soon, either.

But what can we do about it — we being the people expected to hand over our much-needed financial aid to see box-office busts like "Batman and Robin"?

Take it to the city and ask them to encourage outside business to come in and break up the Carmike monopoly.

Take it to the theater owners and let them know what you think and want out of your movie theater.

Take your business to Union Programming Council where the movies are second-run, but cheap and still just as good.

Take it home and watch videos from your own couch and probably with a much better sound system.

But whatever you do, don't just take it.

The smoker in the wild

As temperatures drop, smokers block entrances, forcing others to fight through smoke clouds

It is getting colder outside. Everyone is breaking out the coats, hats and gloves. My grandfather is covering all the windows in plastic wrap. Responsible people are having their antifreeze checked. And the smokers are moving closer to the doors.

If you choose to smoke, so be it. I admit I think it is a dirty, nasty habit, but I have some dirty nasty habits of my own. Smoking may cause cancer, but biting your nails can't be good for you either.

MARY RENEE SMITH

MARY RENEE SMITH is a sophomore in speech. You can send e-mail to Mary at mojo@ksu.edu.

What is the difference between oral fixations really? Nicotine addiction is a bad thing, but it is hard for me to judge anyone until I have had at least two cups of coffee. A two-pack-a-day habit for 10 years at $2 a pack is a lot of wasted money, but my collection of ceramic cows isn't helping in the fight to stop world hunger or financing my children's college education.

Smoking isn't allowed inside most buildings on campus. Anymore, just about every public place you go to has sent smokers outside. During most of the year, you can spot smokers hanging out near their place of work, the residence halls or the K-State Student Union. They usually keep their distance from the path of those coming and going from the building.

But as the seasons change, the smokers migrate, like strange coughing birds, flocking ever closer to the entrances and exits. As we observe the smoker in the wild, we notice they seem to travel in groups. There is a pack mentality to them. Usually there is a leader, the holder of the fire, to whom all the other smokers will turn to in a time of need.

There are also a few lesser-respected members of this strange group. They never have their own fire or tobacco products, they just hover around the group until someone provides them with a cigarette. This process is called "bumming."

In the winter, if you are lucky you can witness the smokers bundled in coats, hats and scarves dancing around in the bitter cold desperately clutching their sticks of flame. Whether this is an attempt to keep warm or a ritual to some god of nicotine is not known to outsiders.

During most of the year, I don't even notice the smokers. But as they move closer to the doors in the fall and winter, I can't help but notice. It isn't just the sea of butts strewn about the sidewalk and adjoining landscape. It isn't just the used up lighters that didn't quite make it to the trash can.

It was a dry, cold morning, I had just walked halfway across campus — I have asthma. I huffed and puffed my way into the building. I had to dance my way through a group of smokers and was almost overcome by smoke. I don't worry about the effects of second-hand smoke. I just hate smelling like an ashtray and coughing until my eyeballs bulge.

There was no way to enter the building without walking through a cloud of smoke. During that day, I noticed other students have the same problem getting into other buildings. I know it will only get worse as the weather gets colder.

The smokers will move closer to the door in a feeble attempt to stay warm while sucking on fire and drawing smoke into their lungs. Anyone else see the irony in this? My favorite ritual is when the smokers prop the door open and smoke outside. This way the smoke is pulled inside, and the heat goes out with the smokers.

Almost worse than the smokers are the smokeless-tobacco users. The most important lesson I have learned since coming to this university is never to drink out of anything I can't see the bottom of and never leave a can of anything unattended. Which is more disgusting: cigarette butts or puddles of chew? The verdict is still out.

Some common courtesy is in order, folks. If you have to smoke, fine, but move out of the way of those of us who choose to get cancer the old-fashioned way (power lines and red meat). If you have to chew, well, find another bad habit 'cuz that's just gross.

Pesky alarms create problems in college when waking up is hard to do

There is a small war going on in my room right now.

It could have dire consequences for the rest of the world.

It is between me and my alarm clock, which I think is out to get me.

VIEWPOINT

JON KURCHE

JON KURCHE is a freshman in physics. You can send e-mail to Jon at jsk6609@ksu.edu.

I bought my Magnavox X2 because it is a sophisticated alarm, and it has a cool name. It is also made by Magnavox, the same people who developed picture-in-picture technology, which means the instruction manual was bigger.

It can play preset compact disc tracks to wake you up. It has four different ways of beeping at you to get out of bed, and, of course, it has a radio. The volume is supposed to get progressively louder if you don't get up immediately to turn it off, which would be annoying — a good quality in an alarm.

The only thing it doesn't do for you is make toast and brush your teeth, primarily because there were some nasty accidents involving extra jelly and an overloaded servo. The toothbrush went berserk and Magnavox scientists were picking up gooey bits of crash-test-dummy-head, which didn't make the dummies happy and convinced Magnavox that consumers wouldn't be happy either.

In any event, I thought I had bought a good alarm clock. It was so simple that a child could set it, and it was built to wake the dead.

Anyone know where I could get a good 4-year-old? The child development center keeps refusing to loan them out.

You see, I'm out of my league. My alarm has no snooze button. It has more dials and switches than I have fingers. I can adjust the brightness of the clock face, but I still can't figure out how to shut it off. I am a physics and biology major, and I can't shut off my stupid alarm. Nothing works. Not even pressing a random series of buttons, which is my usual approach when something is inoperative.

Besides that, my roommates want to kill me.

In the Alpha Tau Omega house, we all sleep in separate cubbies, or "holes," which are these little boxes with window blinds to cover the only entrance or exit. This means that going to bed is a science in finding new ways not to hit your head. This is problematic for several reasons:

1) In a box, you never know whether it's daytime because you can't see the sun.

2) If you have a waterbed mattress, you need a life preserver to get in and out of bed.

3) If there was a fire, we would all die.

My alarm has the capacity to penetrate outside of my cubby, down the hall, into other people's rooms and into their cubbies. My alarm is so obnoxiously loud that my brain refuses to register it anymore just to protect me. My roommates, on the other hand, are very conscious of my alarm.

Beep-beep.

"Kurche ... "

Beep-beep.

"Kurche!"

Beep-beep.

"KURCHE! Shut that damn thing off!"

Beep-beep.

"IT'S SUCKING MY WILL TO LIVE! Noooooo ... "

Beep-beep.

This is on my lucky days. Sometimes my alarm decides not to go off at all. I think my alarm thinks it's funny. It could go off at the appropriate time one day and manage not to wake me up. The next day it won't go off at all, and I haven't done a thing to it. It must have taken consistency lessons from the University Homecoming Committee. I never affected them, and I never affect my alarm, either, which is why I have decided to dispose of it.

I'm going to bury it in a remote corner of Memorial Stadium, alongside Jimmy Hoffa.

Because I'm in the market for a new alarm, one of the options I'm looking at is the "Wailing Banshee 2000," a simple, battery-operated device, which, on its lowest setting, will split eardrums in China. It is specially designed to emit high-frequency, "no-sleep" waves, which are only audible to plants and Jerry Springer.

In the end, though, alarms are really all just a poor imitation of Mom. I have very fond memories of very good dreams being very rudely intruded upon by my mother. Nobody can nit-pick a person out of bed like Mom.

I miss it.

I miss having the light turned on and the radio turned way up in an effort to revive me. I miss being yelled at that I'm wasting my life because I have things to do. I miss being shaken repeatedly. I miss that feeling of triumph when she would give up and go away.

I miss her coming back with my 300-pound stepfather who would sit on me until I agreed to get out of bed.

Those were the days.

Maybe I should invest in the toothbrush attachment for my Magnavox.

Parking signs in city need to be clearer

Editor,

My husband, another alumna and I were victimized in your city on Oct. 18. After the Texas A&M vs. K-State game, we parked our car at 7:25 p.m. in what we thought was a city parking lot near Burger King at 14th and Laramie streets.

After spending money in a restaurant and in a bookstore in Aggieville, we walked back to the parking lot at 8:50 p.m. Our car was gone, and we were scared it had been stolen. But Burger King had it towed, leaving us stranded 65 miles from home. Unknowingly, we had illegally parked in Burger King's parking lot.

We told a security guard we were alumni from out of town and didn't understand that the back row, which is directly adjacent to the public lot, was owned by Burger King. He told us people make the mistake often, but the car was still parked illegally.

We told him we didn't see any signs about illegal parking. He pointed to a sign on a brick-enclosed dumpster that told about illegal parking and being towed. We told him we didn't see the sign when we parked because other vehicles had blocked it from our view and it was dark.

He told us where we could get our car and that we'd have to take a taxi to the wrecker service. All of the blame was placed on us, while we felt we were being victimized.

We had to get $80 from an ATM to retrieve our car, which was towed about 25 minutes after we parked. We were also fined $25 from the city for parking illegally. I can't believe how awful a business and the City of Manhattan would treat K-State alumni, especially on Homecoming weekend.

Obviously, a problem exists in this parking lot, except for those who can earn money from the problem. The signing is inadequate and and needs to be placed directly in front of the row where people are parking illegally. Also, a fence should be erected so people can see where the boundaries between the public and Burger King parking lots are.

If the business owners and the City of Manhattan do not appreciate us, alumni can go to other cities for entertainment.

I'm not spending any more of my money at K-State sporting events, Manhattan Town Center or local craft shows if this is how Manhattan treats visitors.

Finals need to include a weekend break

Editor,

Well into my third semester as a K-State student, I have had some time to reflect on this wonderful institution. Like every other student, I want K-State to be the best it can be.

One improvement I think would help K-State concerns the finals schedule. We have a five-consecutive day finals schedule. I would like to see the university go to a finals schedule that is split by a weekend.

The University of Kansas has a different finals schedule than ours. Its schedule has some highlights we should consider. For example, this semester, KU's "stop day" (designated study day) falls on Wednesday, Dec. 10. Finals are scheduled from Thursday, Dec. 11, Friday, Dec. 12, Monday, Dec. 15 to Thursday, Dec. 18. They also have three designated exam time slots during the day and one at night. Therefore, a student could possibly have four finals in one day. KU allows students to work with the university in this situation to reduce their tests to only two per day.

I would like to ask the Committee on Academic Policy to consider a finals schedule like the one at KU. I think it would benefit students by allowing extra study time. Splitting the week of stress with a weekend would also help students regain composure before plunging back into the dreaded finals.

K-State commended for Homecoming spirit

Editor,

We'd like to commend students, faculty and administrators of K-State for their enthusiasm and spirit during the Homecoming events.

The Manhattan community and the university were benefited in a variety of ways. We would like to thank the nearly 3,000 students who participated in the Paint It Purple community service project coordinated by the United Way. For six Saturdays prior to Homecoming, student volunteers spent several hours working in the community collecting trash, organizing community events, remodeling buildings, completing inventory and hanging posters about Domestic Awareness Month.

More than 2,600 pounds of canned food and $75 in donations were collected at the preliminary bodybuilding competition.

These donations, which are increased from last year, were given to the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

Besides benefiting the community, this year's Homecoming increased the pride of Wildcat Land. A series of week-long events aimed to raise the purple pride before the Homecoming football game. The all-university Homecoming committee planned daily events that everyone could participate in — a Homecoming kick-off pep rally, a punt- and -pass competition and a day designated to wear purple.

And the return of the bonfire should not be forgotten. This year an all-community pep rally attracted residence halls, Black Student Union, greek organizations, alumni, faculty and passers-by.

Nearly 3,000 people welcomed back the tradition of the bonfire, cheered on the Cats in the Pant The Chant competition and got fired up for the game against Texas A&M.

Saturday's game proved to be one of the most-spirited. Students and alumni roared as the Cats found victory over the Aggies. One can't help but credit some of this spirit to the Homecoming activities during the week.

The university should be commended on its positive accomplishments for Homecoming. This win was an ideal finish for a week of hard work, enthusiasm and effort.

Clinton to visit Wichita Nov. 17

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA — President Clinton is scheduled to visit Wichita next month to help dedicate a new facility used by Cessna Aircraft to move welfare recipients into jobs, according to a published report.

Clinton

The Wichita Eagle reported Saturday that Clinton will arrive in Wichita Nov. 17 to dedicate Cessna's job training center, a welfare-to-work facility located in an impoverished neighborhood on the city's northeast side.

Cessna's job-training program started in 1990 and was recently relocated.

A White House official told the Eagle that Clinton's appearance won't be formally confirmed until about a week before the dedication. The visit could not be confirmed with the White House by The Associated Press.

Clinton had spotlighted Cessna's efforts last spring in a White House ceremony, saying more businesses should develop such programs.

Cessna Chairman Russ Meyer Jr. attended the ceremony and extended the invitation to Clinton about a month ago.

"We understand that it is on the president's schedule, and I don't know that it's an absolute guarantee that he will be here," Meyer told the newspaper. "But we're certainly optimistic, hopeful and grateful."

Clinton has not visited Wichita since he was elected president. As a candidate in 1992, he made a brief stop to refuel his plane at the city's Mid-Continent Airport.

The new facility allows Cessna to train and hire more low-income workers and offers short-term housing and day care — amenities unavailable at the old facility, located a few blocks away.

Since the project started, 262 people have entered the sheet metal training program with 146 of those trainees now employed by the company.

Gov. Bill Graves and U.S. Agriculture Secretary Dan Glickman are expected to attend the dedication.

Kansans with HIV to lose medication

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA — A shortfall in a federal fund could mean up to three months without life-saving medication for poor Kansans infected with the AIDS virus, health officials say.

State officials expect the fund that pays for the medicine — about $850,000 per year — to run out sometime in January. The fund won't be replenished until April 1, the start of the federal budget year.

The shortfall will affect about 130 Kansas residents, the Kansas Department of Health and Environment said, and many of them won't survive without their medication.

"Research shows that when you go off your medications, the virus builds up resistance. So when you go back on, the medications are no longer effective," said Donna Sweet, a Wichita physician whose practice includes about 550 HIV-infected patients.

Sweet and others attribute the funding shortfall to the recent availability of drugs that are more effective in controlling the virus, and the drugs' success in helping people live longer. The new drugs are more expensive, however.

An average month's medication cost between $1,200 and $1,300, Sweet said.

The Ryan White Care Act, which pays for AIDS drugs for the needy, is federally funded. It does not involve state tax dollars.

KDHE officials will meet this week to scour their budgets in hopes of finding an extra $150,000, the amount needed to offset the shortfall, said department spokesman Don Brown.

They'll also ask pharmaceutical companies to donate or lend the needed medications.

"Lots of people who are HIV-positive aren't on Ryan White, but for those who are, this is their last resort," Brown said. "There's nothing else out there."

Concern over the shortfall took U.S. Rep. Todd Tiahrt's office by surprise Friday.

"This is the first I've heard of it," said Dave Hanna, spokesman for Tiahrt, R-Goddard. "We'll look into it and see what we can do."

Last year, KDHE officials headed off a similar funding shortfall by taking money out of accounts that helped pay for dental, mental-health and home-health-care services for people with AIDS. Those accounts are now depleted.

"We've put everything into the medications fund, and it's still not enough," said Benjamin Klein, executive director of Connect Care, a Wichita-area program that serves about 200 HIV-infected people. Klein serves on a KDHE committee that oversees the Ryan White Care Act fund.

Bill Eikleberry, 39, lives in a house operated by Connect Care. He has full-blown AIDS.

"If I lose my funding, I'll have to stop taking my medication and I'll be prone to anything that comes along. I'll be sick all the time, like I was before," he said.

Midwest rail-car shortage jeopardizes U.S. grain exports

ASSOCIATED PRESS

OMAHA, Neb. — Record grain harvests aren't unusual. Neither are periodic shortages of railway cars to ship the grain.

But this year, particularly bountiful corn, wheat and soybean crops are piling up on the ground because a sort of railroad traffic jam between the nation's fields and key grain ports on the Gulf of Mexico have spread along the rails of the newly enlarged Union Pacific.

Farmers, grain elevator managers, and politicians blame the rail tie-ups on Union Pacific's purchase of Southern Pacific Railroad, which created the nation's largest railroad. They think the railroad is overwhelmed.

Union Pacific said the congestion would be worse had it not purchased the Southern Pacific and its key lines, but agrees there were problems.

Farm experts fear the backlog will ruin the nation's international markets and could sink grain prices.

"It is a terrible mess, the worst we've ever seen," said Bill Sebree of NIK Marketing, which coordinates grain shipments for 112 elevators in Nebraska, Iowa and Kansas.

"We are running better than 30 days behind schedule for guaranteed grain trains to arrive and we have loaded trains sitting still for up to two weeks," he said. "Elevators are losing up to $30,000 on each train that's late."

The problem is already affecting most of the nation's grain-producing states, and the grain piles are a visible sign of shipping problems that federal regulators will discuss at a hearing Monday in Washington, D.C.

"It's so political and I don't want to upset the railroads by saying anything," said Rick Sorenson, manager of the Continental Grain Co. Outside his elevator in Shelton, about 150 miles west of Omaha, 700,000 bushels of grain stood in a pile nearly three stories high on a lot half the size of a city block.

Sales of soybeans for export have reached only about half the amount sold by this time last year, said Bill Biedermann, a commodity analyst with Allendale Inc. in Crystal Lake, Ill. And only about 20 percent of what's been sold overseas has actually been shipped so far.

"The demand for U.S. grain is good but the guys on the dock are not delivering," Biedermann said. "Our foreign customers will be forced to go to other countries for their imported grain if they have to wait much longer. This is a huge problem for U.S. agriculture."

Union Pacific cites problems affecting its merger partner.

Railroad spokesman John Bromley said floods and derailments in Texas happened at the same time shipping business increased and that all combined to overwhelm the Southern Pacific.

Union Pacific sent some of its employees, locomotives and equipment to help, but that diversion meant the traffic jams spread.

Now-loaded grain cars wait in rail yards for locomotives, which may be busy elsewhere. Heavy traffic along the routes to the Gulf ports mean it takes longer for the grain trains that are moving to make the trip, which delays the return of locomotives and empty cars.

The timing couldn't be worse for farmers who are reaping an expected record soybean crop, the third-largest corn crop and above-average milo and wheat crops.

"Rail car shortages are not new. What makes this year so odd is the amount of grain coming in," said Don Roose at U.S. Commodities Inc. of West Des Moines, Iowa. "It's a strange phenomenon."

He estimates farmers are losing about 10 cents per bushel of grain because of rail delays.

"People are worried they will have to sit on their grain for a while, especially if prices are affected," said Howard Lefler, a corn farmer near Fairmont.

Grain elevators want more covered hopper cars to hold the grain, and Union Pacific said elevators are partly to blame for holding grain from last season's crop in hope of receiving better prices this year.

The railroad has 33,000 grain cars and Bromley said more won't solve the problem.

"You don't fix a traffic jam by adding more cars," Bromley said.

In the meantime, elevators across the Midwest are turning away fresh crops because their storage bins and outdoor stockpiles are overflowing. In Kansas, elevators have been forced to shut down for up to three days at a time while they wait for rail cars.

Roose said the grain futures markets have not yet been affected because most analysts believe the situation will work itself out.

BIG 12 RUNDOWN

No. 19 Oklahoma State and Texas Tech control their own destinies in the Big 12 south. Yet, as the scales of dominance tip further toward the north, destiny is looking like a very rough December afternoon in San Antonio.

Upstart Missouri, the north's third-best team behind top-ranked Nebraska and No. 13 K-State, ended OSU's dream run Saturday in a 51-50 double overtime win. Texas Tech's 16-13 win over No. 25 Texas A&M created a first-place tie.

"We need to play hard and come up with the wins," Red Raiders quarterback Zebbie Lethridge said. "Before you know it we will be playing in the Big 12 championship game, and that is our goal."

Three south teams that won't be at the Alamodome on Dec. 6 took more northern lumps Saturday. Baylor lost 24-17 in Iowa State's first victory, Texas fell in a 47-30 shootout against Colorado and injury-slowed Oklahoma lost 26-7 to K-State.

The south is a combined 5-9 against the north, whose teams have managed to beat all six south teams at least once.

Meanwhile, likely title contender Nebraska and K-State have yet to lose an interdivisonal game.

Once Tony Rogers had cued a late 47-yard field goal off the left upright Saturday to drop A&M (5-2, 2-2) into third place, Tech (4-3, 3-1) turned its game against the Wildcats next week into a pivotal Big 12 affair.

"Today we did anything possible to get our third win in a row," Lethridge said. "We need to continue to stay focused."

Focus was difficult for Missouri after the Tigers fended off Tony Lindsay's two-point conversion try to end the second overtime period. The mayhem in Stillwater featured a teary-eyed coach Larry Smith, an assistant knocked out cold by a jubilantly thrown helmet and a passel of dazed Cowboys (6-1, 3-1).

"This put us on another level," said Missouri quarterback Corby Jones, who threw for four touchdowns and ran for two more.

OSU is on another level now, too. In one wild moment, the Cowboys went from being the south's shining light to being just another part of the first-place dogfight.

They'll travel to College Station to face a troop of wounded Aggies. OSU's loss kept A&M very much alive, but not for long if it suffers a third-straight conference defeat.

"We have a great opponent next week," A&M coach R.C. Slocum said. "We are 5-2 right now, and it will be interesting to see what we do as a team. We have a tough stretch in October, and it will be a real challenge to see if we can come back."

Texas (3-4, 1-3) sustained its year-long implosion against struggling Colorado in a game that was fancied to have had national championship implications just two months ago. Ricky Williams' 201-yard rushing day was little comfort for agitated alumni.

Oklahoma (3-5, 1-3) was helpless without star running back De'Mond Parker, who had just four carries because of a strained abdominal muscle.

Baylor (0-4, 1-6) allowed Iowa State to end a 13-game skid.

Cats blast Sooners, take No. 13

SAM FELSENFELD
staff writer

If you started attending classes at K-State in fall 1993 and are on a seven-year plan to pick up a four-year degree, three things are absolutely certain:

1. You'll never completely pay off your student loans.

2. You need to spend more time at Hale Library and fewer nights in Aggieville.

And ...

3. You'll never see K-State lose to Oklahoma, a team rich with history and tradition that once bullied the Wildcats on the football field for decades.

The Cats beat the Sooners 26-7 Saturday, earning their fifth-consecutive victory over Oklahoma and improving to 6-1 on the season.

Considering the teams won't meet for the next two seasons, Oklahoma can't possibly beat K-State until the year 2000 unless the two schools play in a Big 12 championship game.

For the third-consecutive week, K-State's defense limited its opponent to one touchdown. Also, the Cats limited Oklahoma running back De'Mond Parker, a Heisman Trophy candidate, to minus-three yards on four carries, with a long gain of zero yards.

But the win didn't come as easy as it looked on paper.

"It was a hard game," linebacker Jeff Kelly said."It wasn't like the game was a breeze."

K-State's offense, which entered the game averaging 403.7 yards a game, including 248 yards on the ground, could only manage 162 rushing yards and 320 yards overall.

Meanwhile, the defense, which was allowing only 242.5 yards a game and was coming off a minus-35 performance against Texas A&M's No. 5-ranked rushing offense, gave up 277 yards to the Sooners.

"We played pretty well (on defense), but not as well as the last two weeks," K-State coach Bill Snyder said.

Offensively, K-State scored often enough to win easily, but committed mistakes early that prevented the Cats from controlling the game early.

K-State opened the game looking like the dominant team it had been in the past two weeks. On the game's opening drive, the Cats moved the ball 52 yards on 13 plays.

However, they couldn't convert dominance into points, as Martin Gramatica shanked a 45-yard field goal attempt. It was his first miss in 13 attempts this season, missing wide left.

Oklahoma uses strong safety as quarterback against Cats

SAM FELSENFELD
staff writer

K-State football games have produced a lot of unusual things this year.

Double reverses, first-quarter onside kicks, fake punts, countless quarterback draws, a wishbone offense, 40-yard runs on quarterback draws — you name it, the Cats have been through it.

But during Saturday's game at Oklahoma, the Sooners actually pulled off something the Cats hadn't seen this season.

Eric Moore and Justin Fuente took turns at quarterback. Moore tends to run the option, while Fuente is the Sooners' primary passer.

Defending against a quarterback platoon is nothing new for K-State's defense. The Cats shut down a similar duo last week against Texas A&M.

Against Oklahoma, they shut down Moore and Fuente, frustrating Sooners' Coach John Blake. And when Blake became too frustrated, he turned the trick that K-State had yet to see from an opponent.

He put a strong safety in at quarterback.

And Brandon Daniels, who became the new director of Oklahoma's option attack, didn't do too badly.

Daniels gained 84 yards on 13 carries, an average of 6.5 per rush, and scored the Sooners' only touchdown.

"That dude is really quick," K-State linebacker Jeff Kelly said.

Daniels helped lead Oklahoma to its only touchdown against K-State at the beginning of the third quarter.

"I thought that Daniels kid was playing well," K-State coach Bill Snyder said. "He is quite an athlete. His speed hurt us. He is remarkably faster than anyone I know."

Daniels rushed four times for 30 yards on the drive, including a six-yard scamper for the score.

"We were impressed with his performance today. We have

Cats defeat No. 12 Texas A&M, lose to Texas

SUN DEE MILLS
sports editor

Night and day.

That's the only way to describe the Wildcat volleyball team's 3-0 defeat of No. 12 Texas A&M on Friday and the 3-0 loss to No. 9 Texas on Saturday.

In Friday's 15-6, 15-2, 15-2 match, K-State had what junior middle blocker Val Wieck called a steady performance.

"Before the game started (Friday) night, we were all feeling very steady, no nerves," Wieck said.

That mental attitude helped to shut down the Aggies' offense. The Cats kept the Aggies to a negative .031 attack percentage, the second time in two weeks the Cats limited an opponent to a negative attack percentage.

Aggie hitters Kristie Smedsrud and Stacy Sykora, ranked ninth and 10th in the Big 12 in kills per game, had a .000 combined attack percentage for the match.

Wieck had 10 kills on 14 attempts and total blocks. Kelle Branting recorded seven kills on 14 hits and had one solo and six assisted blocks.

"When we had a huge block, we'd slap hands calmly and say 'Nice job,'" Wieck said. "If we had a huge kill, same thing. If they got a block, we'd say, 'We'll get the next one.'"

That calm exterior crumbled at the hands of No. 9 Texas on Saturday night.

Ex-Cat coach Jim Moore brought his new team into Ahearn Field House undefeated in the Big 12. The Longhorns left still undefeated, beating the Cats 15-13, 15-11, 15-8.

After taking a 3-1 lead in the first game, the Longhorns rallied to an 11-3 comeback. The Cats went on a 10-2 run that tied the game at 13, but they couldn't hang on.

In the second game, the teams switched leading six times. Neither team led by more than two points until the sixth tie at 11.

In the third game, the Longhorns got control earlier and rode the momentum of their previous two wins to finish at 15-8.

"We just had a break in momentum," Wieck said. "When you don't have the momentum, they can take it away from you."

Coach Jim McLaughlin said the Cats never had the momentum.

"We gave them the first game, the second game and the third game," McLaughlin said. "We gave them points. They didn't have to earn points."

Service errors hampered the Cats' performance. The Cats recorded 10 service errors, often following a K-State sideout.

Junior right-side hitter Alexis Shepherd dug out nine balls and had a match-high 14 kills. Wieck had 10 kills and 12 digs on the match.

"We had some defensive brilliance tonight," Wieck said. "We were digging balls out of nowhere. It's something we've been working on, and we keep wanting to go up from here."

But the blocking statistics — Texas' 12 to K-State's six — overcame the fact that the Cats led the Longhorns in kills, assists and digs.

"Last night, we forced A&M to make errors," Wieck said on Saturday. "Tonight, we just made mistakes. They didn't have to do anything."

Moore said he was impressed, but not sur-

Hot dance lessons create fun way to learn about Latino culture

campus editor

The hot, rhythmic moves of two popular Latin dances are being taught at 8 p.m. each Sunday for a month in Union Station.

Michael Bennett, academic adviser for the College of Architecture, said he and partner Sara Saunders, senior in elementary education, both use easy step patterns and contemporary music to entice beginners.

> More info?
> Lessons are offered at 8 p.m. each Sunday until Nov. 16 through UFM. Admission is $10 for individuals and $15 for couples.

"We have fun with it as we teach," Bennett said. "Dancing offers an immediate reward and sense of accomplishment because they are learning and dancing by the end of the first hour."

Bennett said lessons on dancing merengue and salsa, also known as the mambo, have been offered each fall since 1989 in conjunction with Hispanic Awareness Month.

These dances are also among the most popular in Latin dance clubs.

"These are the current dances being danced in Latin clubs in New York and Miami," Saunders said. "It's also a way to learn about Latino culture."

Saunders has 'taught with Arthur Murray in Kansas City, Mo., and has been Bennett's teaching partner since signing up for the lessons three years ago.

"Merengue is extremely easy," Saunders said. "Anyone can learn merengue, and you can always tell when a merengue is on because everyone is on the dance floor."

Although lessons are a good way to meet people, students can also sign up for the lessons with a partner.

"When dancing, people are communication," Bennett said.

Because dancing is a physical form of communication, partners figure out the next step by reading signals from each other.

"The gestures to lead and follow are very slight. It's about signals, eye contact, pressure on the skin and listening to the rhythm," Saunders said. "A man is lead, and it's his job to choreograph the dance spontaneously and it's the job of the woman to follow — which is an art form."

When partners work together and read signals properly, the result is beautiful, Bennett said.

"We are trying to show that two people can come together and move to music together and for a few minutes, they can feel like movie stars," he said.

Although there are usually more women than men at the lessons, each student will have an opportunity to dance with someone.

"Dancing is an excellent way to attract women. Men just do not realize how much women want to have a man who dances," Saunders said.

The majority of students who sign up for the lessons have little or no ballroom dancing experience and the only prerequisite is a willingness to learn, Saunders said.

"Dancing, because it can look so beautiful or exotic, looks hard. It doesn't have to be hard. It's fun and down to earth and imperfect," Saunders said. "We're not training people to be performers. Dancing is casual and something people can do for pure fun."

'Late Night' tries, but fails on music scene

MATT KREPS

Review Music

Now "Late Night with Conan O'Brien" fans can take a piece of the show anywhere they can carry a compact disc player.

"Live from 6A" is the late-night talk show's latest try at marketing its growing popularity into more dollars for NBC. Distributed by Mercury Records, the compact disc features some of the best musical performances to appear on the show, according to the note inside the CD cover.

In reality, the CD has more big names than great music.

The disc gets off to a rousing start with Ani DiFranco's November 1996 appearance with the song "Shameless." Her work's driving guitar backbone and vocals are best described as a sharp compilation of top-of-the-line music. While not the hottest name in the music business, DiFranco knows how to get the audience excited about music.

The CD then takes a sudden change of pace and moves to David Bowie's "Dead Man Walking." Yes, this was a popular piece from a popular artist, but the sudden change really left me hanging. What's more, this is not one of Bowie's greatest performances.

I was gratified to hear Matthew Sweet's "Do Ya." The upbeat rhythm and stronger performance did a good job of pushing me back in favor of the compilation. Unfortunately, this was one of only a handful of good songs on the CD.

Sweet was followed by Jamiroquai and the Swedish sensation Björk. Great, you say? Nope, both "When You Gonna Learn" and "Human Behavior," respectively, were played in 1993. Yes, the before-they-were-stars music can be fun, but I prefer the more recent and just plain better music from these performers.

Elvis Costello's "All This Useless Beauty" almost redeems the tone. I really enjoyed this melancholy piece, which represents some of his nicer work. The piece was also better suited for a live performance on an enclosed stage where powerful guitar solos and hard-hitting vocals just aren't supported.

Having just come to that conclusion, Cake's "The Distance" proved me partially wrong. Their power-packed 1996 recording was every bit as great as the studio version released on the album. Wow!

Once again, the CD listed two less than satisfactory pieces. Jonathan Richman's "Let Her Go Into The Darkness" and Soul Coughing's "Soundtrack To Mary" just didn't do it.

Separating these two was Edwyn Collins' "A Girl Like You" and 311's "Down." Both of these pieces have been performed onstage so often that I would hope they could get it right by now. While these were good performances, I still would rather buy the albums.

Finally, Squirrel Nut Zippers, one of my all-time favorite band names, ended the disc with "Lover's Lane." This band reminds me of Glenn Miller meets 1950s rock 'n' roll. I just had to love it. This was probably the one truly great song on the entire CD.

Frankly, I say buy the artists you like and forget the rest. Unless you're a serious "Late Night" fan, this one isn't for you. The live performances lack the luster of the studio versions, and the snippets of audience cheering just couldn't make up for it.

O'Brien quipped on the jacket that he was excited to hear interest in releasing some of "Late Night's" best musical performances until he found out the producers wanted the band versions, not his. Maybe the disc would have been better if he had sung, or at least recorded, some of the house band's work.

"Frankly, I think we missed a golden opportunity," O'Brien wrote in the jacket.

You're right on the money, Conan.

Quartet's dynamic performance expresses intensity

JAMI NELSON
staff reporter

Review Music

Schubert, Mozart and Brahms would have been pleased with the performance given by the Artis Quartet at 8 p.m. Saturday in McCain Auditorium.

As the Austrian foursome presented works by these composers, a small audience filling only the bottom tier of McCain enjoyed the intense interpretation of classical music.

Schubert's "Overture in C Minor, D. 8a" started the evening with an allusion of rippling waves. The musicians embodied this image as the piece moved them to sway in their chairs to the slow-fast tempo. The short strokes of the bow sounded a playful nature intermixed with the swelling, long strokes.

A similar theme was heard in Mozart's "Quartet in D Major, K. 499 'Hoffmeister.'" The frolicking trill notes and triplets expressed the merriness of the piece, which was later interrupted by a sharp contrast of dynamics and the suave undertones of the cello. This gave the piece darkness and offered more depth.

The four movements of this piece elicited emotions of cheer, sorrow and humor. In the second movement, the cello seemed to respond to the questions of the two violins and viola. This serious tone was then contrasted in the fourth movement with choppy strokes of energy and rising and falling cascades of triplets.

With the completion of the Mozart piece, a stiff silence followed the last draw of the bow. The performers, with their bows still in the air, sat frozen in the movement of the piece, as did the audience.

To complete the evening, the quartet performed its finest musical interpretation: Brahm's "Quartet in C Minor, Op. 51, No. 1." From deep tones rose a flurry of notes between the four instruments. The first movement combined an agitated plucking and abrupt long strokes. This abruptness was quieted in the second movement with a uniform legato.

The final two movements of the piece expressed a restlessness of passion. Propelled by vigor and emotion, the musicians nearly rose to their feet in the final heated movement. Cellist Othmar Muller rocked his cello in sychronization with his swaying head. Violinist Peter Schuhmayer often rested his ear on his violin as if to better feel the piece. With this same intensity, the performers finished with four bows risen high in the air, as if to honor Brahms.

The Artis Quartet not only entertained with its dynamic interpretation but also with its physical performance. Bouncing eye contact served as a metronome throughout the performance. The dynamics were detected in the volume of the piece and also with the musicians' raised eyebrows and discerning facial expressions.

The classical interpretations and performance style of the Artis Quartet evoked a new respect for this Viennese quartet and classical music in Manhattan.

Gramatica said he could have kicked the ball more powerfully, but that didn't cause the error.

Instead, it was the 10-15 mph southwest wind.

"I aimed for the right upright," he said. "But it drifted more than I thought it would."

Oklahoma took over and gained a first down on a face mask penalty, but punted the ball back to the Cats, who committed another mistake and kept points off the board.

David Allen fielded Sooner punter Brian Shackelford's punt at the K-State five-yard line, and almost set his second special-teams record in two weeks.

He brought the ball back for a would-be record 95 yards and a touchdown. But a holding call brought the ball back to the K-State six.

Last week, Allen returned six punts for 125 yards, a K-State record.

"You run that for a score and then you you turn around and they take it back. It's a letdown," he said.

But at least he made it to the end zone.

Last week against Texas A&M, he could have have had two touchdowns, but the Aggies' punter made score-saving tackles.

"There was no way I was gonna let the kicker get me," Allen said.

After the ball was brought back to their six, the Cats couldn't score and traded punts with the Sooners, playing to a scoreless first quarter.

With 3:25 into the second quarter, Gramatica made up for his previous miss by nailing a 27-yard field goal attempt to give the Cats a 3-0 lead, a lead they never surrendered.

K-State's defense protected the lead by only allowing 13 yards on five plays.

The Cats scored on the ensuing drive to take a 10-0 lead, which they carried into halftime.

The Sooners opened the second half with a 12-play, 71-yard touchdown drive to close the gap to 10-7.

But K-State scored on three of its next four possessions, putting the game out of reach.

K-State's numbers weren't overly impressive, but the Cats did pick up one victory and no losses.

"It feels good to win. Period," running back Eric Hickson said.

been working with him and had planned to get him involved today. He came through for us. He made a lot of good things happen for us and made a lot of people miss," Blake said.

"We have a young team that's been through a lot. He gave us a lift today. The players rallied around him and he really gave the offense a boost. Brandon will remain an important part of our offense and we'd like to have him go out and do things right off the bat."

Even though Blake brought Daniels in, he still went back to Moore and Fuente. Often, he switched during drives, rotating the quarterbacks after each play.

Each quarterback had a different style. Moore could pass, but was more successful at executing the option. Fuente rushed three times and lost five yards, but was eight-of-12 passing for 100 yards.

Daniels didn't throw the ball at all but was able to lead the Sooners down the field.

He took control at the end of a first-half drive and led Oklahoma to a second-and-goal situation from K-State's three-yard line.

But Moore came in and fumbled, ending the threat.

The rotation caused problems for the Cats, but not enough, as K-State won 26-7.

"Their large amounts of substitutions made it hard for us to get the appropriate play called," Snyder said. "If they would have substituted quarterbacks earlier in the game it would have been more effective."

Although Daniels hadn't played on offense yet this season, he was prepared to. And judging by his numbers, he might get another crack at it.

"Coach (Blake) came to me to see if I would make the switch to quarterback, just in case our other two got hurt. I just wanted to do whatever helps the team," Daniels said. "I felt comfortable overall. I was nervous at first but after a few plays I felt better. It was fun."

prised, by the Cats' tenacious performance.

"I knew they'd play real well," Moore said. "Both teams serve and block real well, and it's kind of ugly volleyball when both teams serve and block real well."

The bigger Texas team's blocking didn't intimidate the Cats, McLaughlin said.

"They're big, and they get over the net," McLaughlin said.

"We were out of system. We were setting balls over big two-person blocks," he said.

Moore didn't talk to his ex-players after the match, saying he'd left it up to them to decide.

"It's hard being back," Moore said. "I'm glad it's over."

SEVERAL STUDENTS laugh as Victor Morales delivers his keynote address Friday afternoon in Forum Hall.

IMPACT

Morales' stance on issues is influenced by his past. He relied on food stamps to eat as a child and used the GI Bill to pay for college when he returned from Vietnam. Although his Hispanic heritage has been an influence, he said it was not a motivating factor behind his campaign.

"This race was never about being the first Hispanic senator. This was about an ordinary person making a difference by being honest, by being everybody's senator," he said.

In the beginning of his campaign, Morales said he received little confidence from others that he could make a difference. Many expressed doubt that he would ever win a primary.

However, Morales not only won the primaries but lost to Gramm by only 11 points. He spent $900,000 and won 2-1/2 million votes while Gramm spent $9 million.

In spite of the outcome, he said that he still feels victorious.

"The worst thing you could do to me was not vote for me," he said. "Then you would be sending me back to my beautiful wife and kids, and a job I love. I may even have to send you a thank-you note."

Morales said the campaign experience and outcome made him realize that running for congress is a goal he has the ability to achieve. He said he has to keep his important priorities in mind.

"God knows I did everything for the right reason and the right way," he said. "There is no such thing as defeat or failure when you do that."

all.

"Right now we are trying to see if we can use the money that's not used to bring in a Ph.D. or scholarly visitors for a short time period," Yetter said.

At this time some temporary faculty has been hired to help out with the shortage of instructors.

"Even though there are some excellent substitute teachers, students need to be taught by a permanent faculty," Bennett said.

"We've asked university administrators to lift the hiring freezes, but that has fallen on deaf ears," Yetter said.

James Coffman, university provost, said the purpose of the possible hiring freeze was to save money in order to obtain instructional equipment.

"We're going to go slow on the implementation of this to ensure a more complete discussion with faculty leadership and individual deans," Coffman said. "We need to try and fine tune the situation before we can go on."

Yetter said instructional equipments are needed, but not as much as scholarly journals and additional faculty members are needed.

The math department has taken big steps to make it an established math department nationally, he said.

"At one time, our national ranking was 251. Now we are ranked 90th," Yetter said. "We can't be expected to compete nationally if we have a shortage of faculty."

Bennett said with recent increases in the number of students attending K-State, more permanent faculty members would need to be hired.

"You can replace equipment and other learning materials, but you can't replace people," Bennett said.

work cut out for us. We have to get people out of their cars and into shelters."

Nearly 100 residents in Pueblo's blacked-out area were being evacuated by 4-wheel-drive vehicles to a Red Cross shelter at the state hospital, said Rochelle Cruz of the Pueblo County Emergency Operations Center.

Out on the eastern plains, the retreating storm left towns like Limon, Akron and Sterling virtually snowbound.

"About 70 motorists are in the Town Hall, and all of the motels are full," said Lincoln County sheriff's deputy Gordon Noll at Limon, 90 miles east of Denver.

In southern Wyoming, two U.S. Forest Service employees who spent a cold, snowy night outdoors walked to safety Saturday night. Authorities said the hunters were surprised by the strong storm Friday and became lost.

The storm caused scattered power outages in several Colorado communities. Utility officials said they couldn't begin work on restoring service until the wind died down.

"This is as early as I've ever seen it get this wild," Mike Schmidt of Mesa, Ariz., said Saturday at Raton, N.M., where he spent the night in a motel.

College football games in Ft. Collins, between Colorado State and Tulsa, and in Greeley, between the University of Northern Colorado and Nebraska-Omaha, were postponed until Sunday.

The worldwide El Nino phenomenon, expected to give parts of the West a wet, stormy winter, could be involved in the severity of the October blizzard, said Frank Denton at the National Weather Service office in Denver.

"We haven't had time to research it," he said. "We can't even get people to come to work."

give nuclear assistance to Iran, Pakistan and other countries. An agreement would include the lifting by the Clinton administration of restrictions on the sale to China of U.S. nuclear reactors.

The secretary said some good news also has come on human rights, the recent release from custody of a Roman Catholic Chinese bishop imprisoned for preaching outside the government-sanctioned church.

Sen. Orrin Hatch, a conservative Republican from Utah who recently visited China, praised the administration's position on human rights, pronouncing it "the best way to work with China."

He predicted on "Fox News Sunday" that while China, not wanting to appear to surrender to pressure, will avoid making human rights concessions at the summit. "I do believe that shortly after that, you'll see some changes in human rights," he said.

Other lawmakers with grievances against China continued to demand that Clinton be as blunt as possible with Zemin.

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., sponsor of legislation that would sanction nations that punish people for religious beliefs, asked Clinton to hand Zemin a letter seeking the Chinese leader's approval to visit China and Tibet to examine religious persecution.

Sen. Dirk Kempthorne, R-Idaho, also sent Clinton a letter asking him to press Jiang to remove a Chinese ban on wheat and barley from the U.S. northwest.

One of Capitol Hill's most outspoken China critics, Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said on CNN that the Beijing government scored "a great victory in getting a state visit," she said.

"Why should we be rolling out the red carpet for the leader of a regime that crushes dissent in its own country? Why should we give a 21-gun-salute to the leader of the People's Liberation Army, which proliferates weapons of mass destruction" in rogue nations?

"It would give the pedestrian the right-of-way as soon as there's a gap," Messer said.

MacFarland said the project does not consider the safety of pedestrians because its goal is to increase the speed of vehicles.

"The whole thing is designed to move traffic at 30 mph. That's what KDOT wants," he said.

MacFarland said traffic would still be congested because of the planned parking garage to be located in the K-State Student Union parking lot.

"It's only going to be a temporary fix," he said. "I don't believe it's a balanced plan."

MacFarland also said the right-turning lane was not included in the original plans. Messer said the turning lane was included in the plans. However, he said the length of the lane increased as plans developed.

"It became evident that we were going to need a longer lane than was originally shown," Messer said.

Committee members agreed, in light of the additional meeting, that they should not send a resolution to Student Senate until more student opinion was gathered.

Resources program. His interest in the program arose from his job as a prosecutor with the Riley County attorney's office.

"I got involved with this because I wanted an alternative to working with kids other than prosecuting."

Others volunteered with civic groups or K-State campus organizations. One such organization was the Smith Scholarship House.

"We try to organize occasional opportunities to donate time with the community in response to the kind of benefits we receive from living here," Matt Sandbulte, Smith resident said.

"College is for preparing to be part of society, and I really value sharing time and resources," he said.

Course information proposal may be funded with new privilege fee

SARA BURDETTE
staff reporter

Lafene Health Center, Student Publications Inc. and Bramlage Coliseum have one thing in common. These services, along with many others, receive money from student's privilege fees. Now, the Privilege Fee Committee might add another fee to the list.

Although nothing has been voted on, the committee discussed adding a fee to help the course information program, created by Chris Hansen, former student body president, to help students learn more about K-State teachers.

The only way to get information on the way professors teach is to ask them. The course information program would allow students to access teacher evaluations and surveys.

Although a small percentage of the funding will come from administrative support, most would come from the new fee, if it is passed.

The fee would be distributed in three areas, Hansen said. A graduate student would be hired to coordinate the educational research. This student would be paid $5,000 to $10,000 a year to be competitive with similar positions on campus.

The next portion of the fee would be allocated for undergraduate students assisting in the coalition of the data. The last portion of the fee would go toward the printing and dissemination of the survey.

Originally, the committee members said they thought about including the fee in the Office of Student Activities and Services fee because it will not require a significant amount of money. The program will cost about $20,000, Hansen said. The committee decided it would be better for the OSAS to keep the two separate.

"Our budget is really complicated now," Gayle Spencer, OSAS coordinator, said. "If you put the money in the OSAS budget, you set a precedent for every little thing going into that budget."

If the program receives funding, it will begin collecting data in fall 1998 and the information would be published and available for spring 1999.

The committee also voted unanimously to write the bill for Bramlage favorably with a $15,000 cut in its budget because Bramlage has close to $100,000 in its reserve account.

Committee member Jeff Meder commended Bramlage Director Charlie Thomas for staying within the budget, but, he still had some concerns with allowing Bramlage to receive the same amount of fees in the future.

"I have a problem with allocating $30,000 and only have half of that spent," Meder said.

Meder said Bramlage will be given

Ex-professor sues K-State for $1 million

JOHN HENDERSON
senior staff writer

A mass communications professor is claiming that his tenure was maliciously denied last year by three faculty members who "willfully conspired" to defame him.

As a result, Ali Kanso El-Ghori is suing the university, its president and the three faculty members for $1 million.

El-Ghori, now living near Boston came to K-State as an assistant professor in 1990. He was denied tenure in Decemder 1995 and left the faculty this summer.

El-Ghori

According to the suit, he named Tom Grimes and Charles Pearce, both tenured professors in journalism and mass communications at K-State, to have "purposely and maliciously prepared and circulated to the (College Advisory) Committee and the Dean (of Arts and Sciences) false assessments of the plaintiff's teaching and scholarship qualities."

In the suit, El-Ghori said that Grimes, claiming to be El-Ghori's "mentor," wrote the committee a letter in which he said El-Ghori was a "'lifer' whom the school would be stuck with," published "amateurish" research articles and falsified research data.

The suit contends that Grimes had a "personal animus" for El-Ghori and had enlisted the help of Pearce, who was El-Ghori's real mentor in the tenure process, to circulate "false assessments of the plaintiff's teaching and scholarship qualities."

Grimes had allegedly referred to El-Ghori, who is Lebanese, as an "Ay-Rab," a comment El-Ghori said in the suit is evidence that Grimes had a racist motivation for his actions.

In addition, El-Ghori's tenure approval would mean that Grimes would have to "keep up" with El-Ghori's higher rate of research productivity, the suit claims.

If the two had not interfered, the suit claims, El-Ghori would have received tenure. Because he did not, and had been on the faculty for more than six years, his contract wasn't renewed.

Peter Nicholls, dean of the College Arts and Sciences, had sent El-Ghori a mid-tenure review letter in May 1993 that praised his ability as a teacher and researcher.

"You are a valued member of our faculty," Nicholls' letter read, "and I know that your continued efforts in scholarship and teaching will keep you on track for a

Dow drops 554 points

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — In a day of worsts on Wall Street, the Dow Jones industrial average plummeted a record 554 points Monday, forcing an early halt to trading for the first time under rules adopted following the Black Monday crash of 1987.

The selloff was set off by an economic crisis in Southeast Asia and was aggravated as traders sought to preserve profits before all their gains for the year were gone.

The Dow's plunge of 554.26 to 7,161.15, surpassed the 508-point loss of Oct. 19, 1987, the previous record drop. But the 7.2-percent decline, while the 12th-largest ever, was not close to the 22.6-percent collapse in the '87 crash.

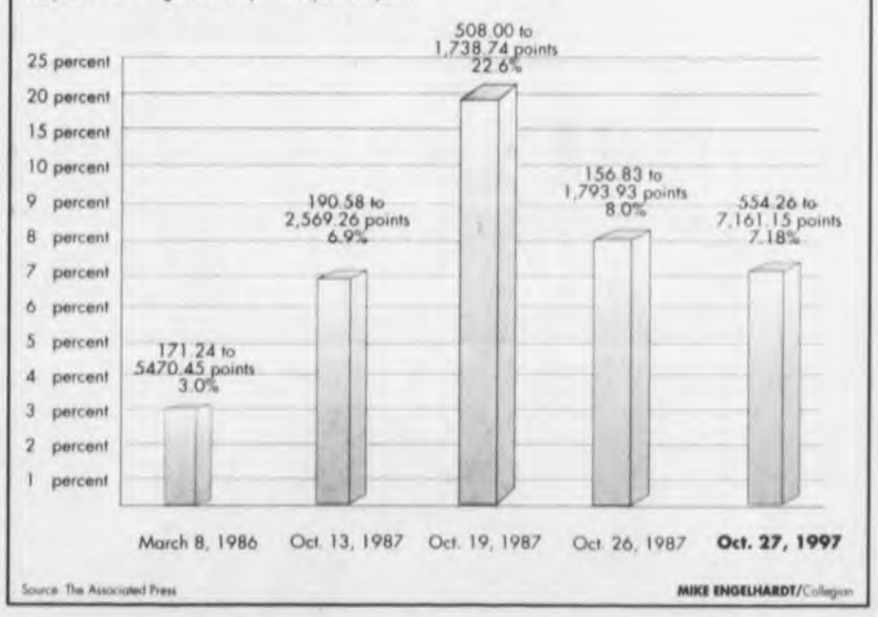
Broader stock market indicators also had record point losses.

Overall trading was near Friday's all-time record, with a new high in volume on the New York Stock Exchange.

"This was the snap between the eyes," said Alfred E. Goldman, vice president at A.G. Edwards & Sons Inc. in St. Louis. "The market was in a correctional phase for three weeks, and the situation in Asia just opened the flood gates."

With Monday's loss, the Dow's losses grew to nearly 11 percent, or 874 points, since Wednesday's close. It was on Thursday that a 10 percent drop in Hong Kong's main index began sending shockwaves throughout world financial markets.

Wall Street's best-known indicator also is off 1,100 points from its Aug. 6 record of 8,259.31, a drop of 13.3 percent and the first "correction" of more than 10 percent since October 1990.



Even with the decline, the Dow is up 11 percent this year.

Under rules adopted after the 1987 crash and aimed at restoring order to sharply moving markets, trading was halted for a half hour at 2:35 p.m. as the Dow for the first time passed one of the "circuit breakers" — a drop of more than 350 points. After the halt ended at 3:05 p.m., it took just 25 minutes to lose an additional 200 points and pass the 550-point barrier. That stopped trading for an hour, ending a trading

Game offers stock-market skills, instruction without money loss

KRIS ROBL
staff reporter

The temptation of playing the stock market has become an academic pursuit.

There is even one way to invest in the stock market but not lose any money in the process.

The K-State's Center for Economic Education offers a stock market game to all 105 counties in Kansas. The Stock Market Game is an electronic-educational simulation of Wall Street trading, designed to help students and adults understand the stock market, the costs and benefits involved in decision-making, the sources and uses of capital and other related economic concepts.

"Our main purpose is to get students to learn more about economics in the United States," said Dorothy Soldan, the economic center director and coordinator for the Stock Market Game in Kansas.

Soldan said there are two ways to study the stock market: on a corporate level and an individual level.

The corporate level deals with how capital is raised and how companies are organized. The individual level deals with understanding investments and how the stock market affects the economy.

Mike Dacker, a high school economics teacher from Los Angeles, started one of the first investment classes for high school students in the United States.

Dacker said he believes students of the Faculty member isolated by peers

JAMI NELSON
staff reporter

An unnamed department has censured a faculty member, but Faculty Senate is releasing little information on the issue at this time.

Following a disagreement, some members of the faculty took a vote to have an individual isolated from the rest of the department. This action caused a dispute regarding the behavior of faculty members, said Senate spokesman Michael McNamara.

"We're trying to focus on the principles. We don't think a group of faculty members should behave in this way," he said.

Brad Fenwick, Senate faculty affairs chair, said he could not discuss the censure, but said Senate is addressing the principles.

"What Faculty Senate has done is taken a position on the principles of how faculty members should be treated," Fenwick said.

McNamara had no comment on the details of the situation and named none of the involved faculty members.

"Many people are concerned about this issue. We're trying to fix this problem," McNamara said. "There is an opportunity to fix it this week."

McNamara said the department is trying to solve the dispute internally.

If the issue is not resolved this week, Senate will be more likely to comment, McNamara said.

5th wave of Fort Riley soldiers expected to return from Bosnia

FORT RILEY, Kan. — A welcome-home ceremony is expected to greet approximately 80 Fort Riley soldiers returning from Bosnia.

The soldiers are expected to land in Forbes Field Air Force Base in Topeka at 11 tonight and continue on to Fort Riley. Friends and family are encouraged to attend the welcome-home ceremony at Hangar 817 on Marshall Field at 1 a.m. Wednesday, depending on potential delays.

The soldiers are the fifth wave of Fort Riley soldiers to return after a six-month tour of duty in Bosnia. Since the first return in early September, almost 1,000 soldiers have returned from participating in Operation Joint Guard.

Although a date has not been set, the final wave of about 100 soldiers is due to return in mid-November. After that return, no Fort Riley units will remain in the war-torn country.

Authorities say HIV-infected man linked to at least 11 new cases

MAYVILLE, N.Y. — At least 11 young people became infected with HIV, and health authorities said Monday they traced the outbreak to a man who approached teen girls in schools and parks and traded drugs for sex.

Chautauqua County Health Commissioner Dr. Robert Berke said the 20-year-old man continued having sex after he learned he had HIV, the virus that causes AIDS.

Public health authorities counted 28 cases of direct sexual contact and 53 cases of secondary contact — people who had sex with any of the 28. Seventeen other cases were still being studied, bringing the total number of people possibly linked to the man to 98, Berke said.

"This case demonstrates the unacceptable level of drug and alcohol use in our teens," he said. "Sex for drugs appears to be implicated in at least some of the contacts."

The man, Nushawn Williams, is in custody in the New York City area, the Post-Journal of Jamestown reported Monday.

State spokeswoman, Frances Tarlton said she has never heard of a case in New York state where one apparent HIV carrier possibly infected so many others.

University, museum censor nudes from traveling sculpture exhibit

PROVO, Utah — Mormon Church-owned Brigham Young University has pulled four nudes from an exhibit of works by renowned French sculptor Auguste Rodin, including his famous " The Kiss."

"We have felt that the nature of those works are such that the viewer will be concentrating on them in a way that is not good for us," said Campbell Gray, director of the BYU Museum of Art.

Gray said museum and university officials discussed the issue for two months before deciding the four works would be censored.

Rodin's sculpture "The Kiss" shows a man and woman, both nude, in an embrace. Other pieces pulled from the exhibit during its stay through January at BYU are " Saint John The Baptist Preaching," "The Prodigal Son" and a " Monument to Balzac."

Three years ago, the school was the brunt of criticism for its decision to cut portions of the movie "Schindler's List" showing nudity and violence when it showed on campus.

Bike race raises funds to help K-State alumnus

LORI GUILFOYLE
staff reporter

Fund raising for a friend in need of a double lung transplant was the motivation behind the bike tour from Kansas City to Manhattan on Saturday in the rain.

Rhoades

The 120-mile bike tour down U.S. Highway 24 was initiated to raise money for John Rhoades, a K-State alumnus and member of Alpha Tau Omega fraternity, who is on the donor list for a double lung transplant. Rhoades is one of 20,000 people in the United States who suffer from cystic fibrosis, a disease caused by a genetic defect.

Rhoades began at K-State in fall 1992. He had to leave school permanently in December 1995because of poor health. He has been unable to continue his education because of his three-week hospital stays every two to three months.

The idea behind the fund-raising bike tour, named the "120 Milhouse Mile to Manhattan" after Rhoades' nickname, Milhouse, was originally developed by Tim Madden, K-State alumnus and fraternity brother of Rhoades. Rhoades' friends had been brainstorming ideas to raise money for the transplant since his name was added to the donor list, when Madden came up with the idea of a bike tour, said Rich Cherra, K-State alumnus and fraternity brother of Rhoades.

"This was something we all could do together that would be a lot of fun," he said.

Planning for the tour began in September, which just happened to be the most convenient weekend.

"Canceling because of the weather was never an option we considered," Cherra said. "We knew this might have been our only chance. If we would have waited any longer, the weather would have gotten worse."

Six two-person teams left Kansas City at 8 a.m. Saturday and arrived in Manhattan at 3:30 p.m. All the riders rode for 10 miles and then switched off with their partners. Leading the tour was a Dodge Travco Recreational Vehicle, which carried supplies, team members and Rhoades, who helped drive the RV.

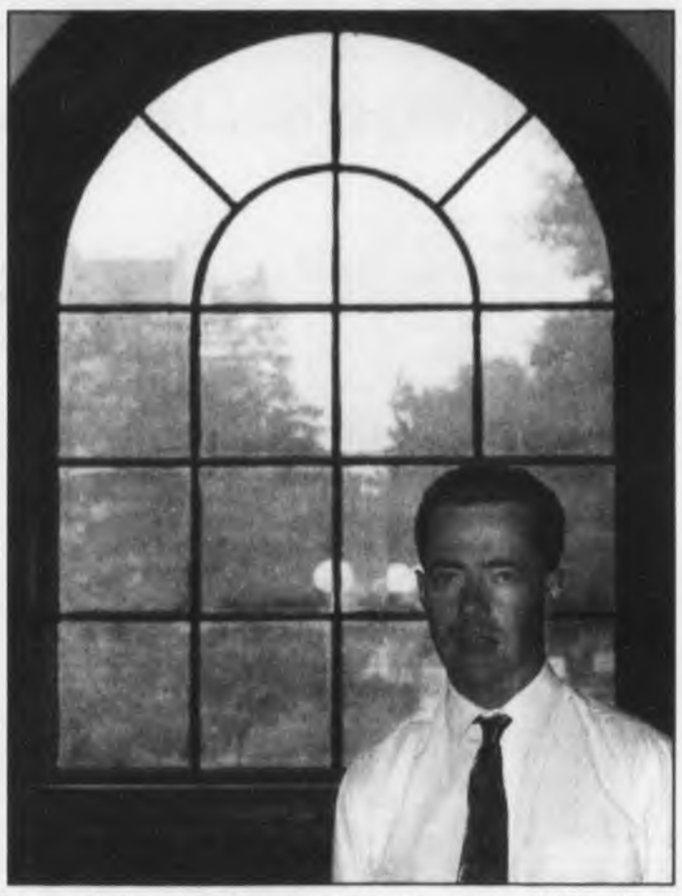
Professor researches food contamination

JENNI EVANS
staff reporter

The recent increase in contaminated beef, pork and poultry products might lead some consumers to believe there is no way to ensure food safety.

John Fox, assistant professor of agricultural economics, believes consumers are willing to pay for those measures to ensure the safety of their meat.



The process that he has concentrated his research on is irradiation.

"Irradiation is the process whereby foods are exposed to electromagnetic energy. At the approved dosage levels, 1.5 to 3 KiloGrays, it will kill up to 99 percent of salmonella. It's also very effective against the bacteria E. coli," Fox said.

Irradiation destroys insects, fungi or bacteria that cause human disease or cause food to spoil.

Fox has centered most of his research on whether consumers will buy irradiated poultry products.

"I found that people, when given accurate information about irradiation, are prepared to purchase those foods that have been irradiated," he said.

IVAN KOZAR

No food manufacturing plants use this irradiation process. Fox said he believes this is because companies fear adverse consumer response

"Most food manufacturers have been reluctant to adopt the technology, because they are afraid that consumers will react badly to purchasing irradiated foods," Fox said.

Other concerns come from consumer advocacy groups that think the irradiation process is unsafe.

"They may boycott stores that carry irradiated products," Fox said.

The process, however, is safe. The food does not become radioactive, as some advocacy groups believe.

Irradiation involves passing the food through an irradiation field, but the food never touches the radioactive substance. The energy passed through the product destroys most of the bacteria but does not alter the product in any way.

The place in the United States that uses this process of irradiation is an independent plant in Florida.

Consumers who want their products irradiated bring them to the plant.

To irradiate food, meat manufacturers would need to build an irradiation chamber. The irradiation process would be the last step in manufacturing.

Fox estimates that building an irradiation chamber would cost anywhere from $1 million to $5 million.

To determine whether consumers would be willing to pay for the safety of their food, Fox conducted surveys and used experiments and retail trials.

The survey was mailed randomly to 400 people and included the USDA pamphlet, "Ten Most Commonly Asked Questions About Irradiation."

The survey results showed that 81 percent would prefer irradiated poultry if it were offered at the same price.

In the experiments, Fox brought in a group of people and asked them to read the USDA pamphlet. They were then asked if they would purchase irradiated or non-irradiated poultry. Seventy-seven percent of the participants said they would purchase irradiated chicken.

In the final experiment, Fox made the irradiated chicken available at two grocery stores in Manhattan over a period of four weekends.

The chicken was clearly labeled as being irradiated and informational pamphlets were left out for consumers to read.

The irradiated chicken accounted for 43 percent of total sales, but Fox said few people took the time to read the pamphlet.

Fox said that consumer's choices depend greatly on the information they receive about irradiation.

When negative information is provided, no matter how untrue, people will not purchase irradiated food.

Community Health Council receives grant worth $600,000 for improvement of services

ASHLEY YOULE
staff reporter

The Community Health Council has been awarded a $600,000 Rural Health Network Development Grant from the Office of Rural Health Policy.

The Community Health Council, made up of Manhattan-area physicians, health care providers, city and county government agencies, K-State and Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 representatives and the community members, ensures access to care and pledges to improve the delivery of health care services to the community, Jessica Dederer, director of community services at Homecare and Hospice, said.

Nationally, the Office of Rural Health Policy gives grants that are awarded across the nation, and the Community Health Council received the biggest one.

"The council hasn't applied for one before, so we were really excited to not only get one of the grants but to get the biggest one," she said. "The grant-writing team really deserves a huge thanks. They were very instrumental in writing the grant and the council recognizes their talent and effort."

Jon Rolf, the director of the Office of Community Health at K-State and the Kansas Health Foundation distinguished professor in community health, was a crucial part of the grant-writing team.

"I've had practice writing grants. When I worked on my Ph.D., all we did was write grants. It's what I do well," Rolf said.

The grant-writing team worked on the grant for about a week last spring, Rolf said.

"Usually the grant process can take up to nine months, but we found out in September. We knew since we hadn't heard anything prior to that we might still be in it," he said.

The grant award is for $200,000 per year for the next three years, Dederer said. "We are starting right now and will go until October 2000. It's definitely not a lot of money, but it gives us something to work with."

The council is aiming to continue to develop the council as a community organization, increase joint planning and decision-making, improve communication among providers and explore regional managed care approaches, Dederer said.

The Rural Health Network Development Grant is part of the Rural Outreach Grant Program, which was established in 1996, Dederer said.

"The grant program was established to assist rural communities to expand access, increase quality and decrease the cost of health care services," Dederer said. "We're a rural community and receiving the grant shows that there's a lot of promise here in Manhattan."

KSU Stadium alcohol policy, advertisements exhibit hypocrisy

Don't make a run to the liquor store before the big game. Forget about beer at your next tailgate party.

Alcohol is not allowed at KSU Stadium — unless you're special.

For the majority of football ticket holders (the un-special), alcohol is not allowed inside the stadium or in the stadium parking lot.

This policy makes sense. It helps crowd control and promotes safety on game day.

But don't think that the athletic department's alcohol policy — posted on numerous signs and enforced by police — applies to everyone. It doesn't.

For those who purchase club seating or luxury boxes in the Dev Nelson Press Box, alcohol is allowed. Guests in the boxes can also partake.

But by allowing alcohol in the press box, the athletic department makes the dangerous assumption that those with money and influence will drink responsibly.

The department also sends a strong message to other loyal less well-to-do Wildcat fans: You're not rich enough to drink.

Plus, while thousands of fans watch football games at KSU Stadium and follow stadium alcohol rules, the Jumbotron at the north end of the stadium displays beer advertisements.

Coors, it seems, isn't just for rich people. Away from the stadium, alcohol is acceptable. At football events, however, only higher-ups can handle it.

By allowing alcohol in the press box and accepting money from alcoholic beverage companies, the athletic department sends mixed signals about alcohol. This should be stopped.

If some can't have alcohol, no one should. That makes regulations easier to enforce and it boosts safety during the game and on the drive home.

The athletic department should also find other sources for revenue besides beer advertisements. Hale Library needs money, but no one has suggested a Bud Light Reading Room.

Alcohol and its advertisements should be banned from the stadium entirely. That ensures a safe game day for everyone — without the mixed signals.

Parking problems have an unsuspected culprit

Students decide own destiny when it comes to wheel locks, tickets in campus parking lots

If ignorance is bliss, welcome to Utopia.

You live in a place where lack of thinking is commonplace.

A place where people are oblivious to "No Parking" signs.

A place where "Fire Lane" is often interpreted as "Please, Park Here."

A place where a wheel lock is always someone else's fault and the handicap parking spots should be open to anyone.

You live in a place where the very agency that works to keep parking manageable is the same group that is constantly under attack by negligent car owners.

If there were no parking meters and no one to issue tickets, we would all be in trouble. It is the threat of receiving a ticket that forces us to park in appropriate places. I guarantee that if I had no incentive to do otherwise, I would drive to the K-State Student Union in early August, park my 1973 Volkswagen Micro Bus (provided it was running) up close to the building, and leave it there. There would never be a parking spot available if Parking Services did not provide the incentive (i.e. wheel locks) to move your car every once in a while.

Parking Services is not only doing its job but also doing a favor to all students by controlling cars on campus. They are a necessary factor to ensure safety, organization and efficiency. They are good. If we all nag them, the hang-ups enter unanswered limbo. They can't deal with the petty complaints of 20,000 students over parking tickets.

Now, I'm not saying that parking on campus is perfect. We'd all love to be able to find a close spot at any given time, but this will never happen. We must work with Parking Services to make sure that the parking situation gets better.

This shouldn't be too hard to understand, but just in case it is, I have created a list of advice to help you deal with parking and thus avoid unpleasant meetings with Parking Services.

Helpful Hint No. 1: Parking meters require money. Yes, it' s true. You have to pay to park in the metered spots. I realize that the 35 cents or so you have to pay could feed 13 children in a far away country, but you can' t tell me that you can' t afford it. Dump the cigarette butts out of your ashtray and carry loose change around with you.

VIEWPOINT

CHRIS McLEMORE

CHRIS McLEMORE is a sophomore in political science and speech. You can send e-mail to Chris at clm1882@ksu.edu

Helpful Hint No. 2: Pay your parking tickets. The reaction that is typical when receiving a wheel lock is very perplexing. When you already have numerous unpaid parking tickets and you double park your car in a faculty handicap parking space, at what point does the reception of a lock become surprising?

Do you think the friendly Parking Service employee will simply overlook the fact that your car is parked on the lawn in front of Anderson Hall? Paying parking tickets is an easy way to circumvent the big, yellow tire bastard. You might not have money to pay for the tickets, but the wheel lock charge is even more expensive, and you still have to pay the tickets.

Helpful Hint No. 3: Carpool. This whole parking problem could be alleviated if we would use common sense. I know you can fit at least four people in a Camaro Z-28, so do it for corn's sake. Carpooling saves on gas, decreases traffic and will hopefully lead to the creation of a carpool lane that runs down Anderson Avenue. If you and a friend are at the same place and going to the same place, do it together. Besides, if you carpool, every morning would be like a Blondie cartoon (Dagwood omitted).

Helpful Hint No. 4: Don't drive if you don't have to. We must decrease driving to school unnecessarily. A cartoon that ran in the Collegian earlier this semester showed a student arriving to class exhausted. The reason? He couldn't find an open spot, so he parked by Nichols Hall and walked all the way across campus to his class.

Brilliant.

Leaving the car at home and walking from your residence, as opposed to walking from Nichols Hall after searching unsuccessfully for a parking spot, would be a much better idea. Granted, there are people who live far from campus and should drive. That's why the parking spots were created. However, driving from two blocks away only to park four blocks from your class is not smart. Ask a math major for specifics.

The overall problem is not just the parking woes of students. The problem is the continued harassment that Parking Services receives. Complaining about them is like killing a fly on a window with a sledgehammer. Sure, you might get rid of the fly, but you create a larger problem than you originally had.

So don't continue to harass the parking employees. If you get a ticket and become violently angry, pretend that the man wearing the Parking Services smock wasn't the one who gave it to you.

After all, ignorance is bliss.

Corporate malls try but never succeed at replacing town squares

When one arrives from Kansas Highway 177 by car in Manhattan, one does not notice a proud city hall or the architectural signifiers of K-State. It's the Sears department store.

The placement of Manhattan Town Center at the end of the proverbial rainbow bridge over the river says as much about Manhattan as the city's need for reminding its residents, via white-painted rocks on a hillside, that they live in Manhattan.

The Town Center was built in 1987 and is celebrating its 10th anniversary this year — with a $50-per-person gala to boot. It was built to replace a collection of decrepit buildings, revitalize downtown Manhattan and make it extremely difficult to travel from east to west in the city with a car. Residents reasoned that if a mall had to be built, which is an inevitable occurrence in the United States, it might as well be something of which they were proud.

For a mall, one can be reasonably happy with the Town Center. True, one can't have a memorable meal or buy unique fashion, but the mall is a pleasant enough place. Its evocation of a Manhattan design style, evidently industrial sheds and schlocky postmodern detailing, is warm and friendly; the fountains alone offer respite from the boredom of shopping.

It remains, however, that one can live an entirely rewarding life without ever having set foot in the Town Center.

Although the mall has tried to sell itself as some sort of modern town square — a place for chance meetings, "picnics" and shopping, it is quite private in nature as per its owners Forest City Enterprises. You won't see any protests or free-speech zones near the mall entrance to Dillard's. Outside of consumption and the occasional themed fair or free concert, by its very definition the mall cannot act as purely public space.

VIEWPOINT

RUSSELL FORTMEYER

RUSSELL FORTMEYER is a senior in architectural engineering. You can send e-mail to Russell at rmf@ksu.edu

Dueling interests abound. The public entertainment offered at the mall also serves to keep people in the mall to shop. There is no containment aspect to a typical downtown shopping street. Unlike a mall, no master developer has shrewdly calculated what architectural styles and symbols will appeal to consumers on Main Street, U.S.A.

However, the Town Center represents what amounts to public space in the modern city. What has made Manhattan's mall experience special, as opposed to all of those other bad, boxy malls like Town East or West in Wichita, Kan., or Bannister Mall in Overland Park, Kan., is that ours has replaced our downtown.

The suburb-dwellers of west Manhattan and the Wamego countryside are attracted to the Town Center simply because it offers them a focused environment like a town square that is "in the heart of it all." The mall offers the human interaction and grand open spaces a city downtown should, as opposed to the parking lot mania of Westloop or the Wal-Mart/K-Mart shop-plex.

Don't kid yourself, Manhattan. The masses of consumers aren't hitting the streets, they're hitting the tiles. The only traditional urban center in Manhattan that has maintained its vitality and customer loyalty is Aggieville. And that might be more about bars than shopping ('ville-stalwart Varney's has opened a mall branch in the past two years).

Lately, the mall has begun to mimic Manhattan's downtown perhaps a bit too closely.

Both large wings of the Town Center are near-ghost towns — empty storefronts of failed shopping concepts that now showcase over-sized cellular phone stores and this year's collection of automobiles. Locally owned specialty stores selling candles and sunflowers open for a few months and close with football season. Is this what Manhattan needs?

It's like an old town with empty building storefronts seasonally decorated with pumpkins or old furniture evoking an elegant past, a city center a la Wichita's Cowtown attraction.

The mall has become a theme park at yet another level. It's turning into a museum artifact to be examined.

"Oh, yes, Timmy, that corrugated metal shopfront housed an old jeans store that lasted a year."

Timmy: "Wow! They sold jeans back then, Grandpa?"

Perhaps no one understands this more than the critic Margaret Crawford, who wrote of malls in the 1992 book "Variations on a Theme Park" that "architects manipulated space and light to achieve the density and bustle of a city downtown — to create essentially a fantasy urbanism devoid of the city's negative aspects: weather, traffic and poor people."

That might be overstating the case for the Town Center and yet it's eerily familiar. What consumer wants to be confronted with real life, which might be unsettling, when they are considering buying a shocking orange overcoat? The fact that Manhattan is not crime-ridden or too poverty-stricken makes this consideration foolish, and yet we have a mall.

But whereas the real downtown of Poyntz Avenue belongs to the city and its people, it will always be cared for and respected. Who will step forward to lead a revitalization when the Town Center deteriorates in quality even more?

The Town Center could, like many other malls across the country already have, degenerate into a place for tourists, but very much unnecessary to the daily life of Manhattanites. How long did downtown Manhattan survive before showing its age Surely longer than 10 years.

Widening of Anderson hazardous to pedestrians

Editor,

As someone who crosses the street at least four times a day at one of the places that will be affected with the proposed widening of Anderson Avenue, I find myself in agreement with Evelyn Wray's letter to the editor on Friday.

Car drivers routinely run red lights and speed in this section of Anderson Avenue. Anything that encourages this kind of behavior while destroying green space is dangerous and short-sighted. I hope the City Commission will reconsider this ill-advised venture at the earliest possible moment.

Support for football comes from students

Editor,

I just wanted to take a moment to say that I think the idea of expanding the KSU Stadium is a great idea.

I recall the very first game that I saw there in September 1990. It was the home opener, and the team played an excellent game. Unfortunately, there were very few fans (including students) in the stands.

It was at that game, almost two years before I began attending K-State, that I saw the good team that the Wildcats are and would be.

I think it is great that the idea of expansion is now a reality, since the Wildcat staff and players have worked hard over the past seven or eight years to make that good team the great team that it is today.

Back in 1991, no one would have thought that K-State could beat Oklahoma for five straight years. We thought back then it was good to get a first down.

What a difference the current coaching staff has made. Bill Snyder and his staff were hired to do a job, and now they are just one or two wins away from something never thought possible, a national championship.

I am glad to see the plan that started in 1989 when the Snyder era began rise to the level of real stadium expansion. It is the right step and needs our full support.

However, it is also important to remember who the players really play for. While there may be several answers, one group without question is the students.

Without students, there is no team at all.

The support of the student population is intangible to the players when they are doing well and provides encouragement when they need the support. Therefore, I think it is important to keep the student support right where it belongs — behind the team.

'Lynch Mob' negative nickname for Wildcats

Editor,

Something has started that really needs stop.

K-State has an excellent football team, which has had one of the best team defenses in the nation for the past several years. Such a tradition makes this defense deserving of a nickname like Texas A&M's "Wrecking Crew."

In that vein, many are beginning to refer to K-State's defense as the "Lynch Mob." I'm sure that the intent of this nickname was merely to honor the team, but it does much more.

Lynching, for those who are unfamiliar with the term, refers to the practice of groups of whites hunting down African-Americans, brutalizing them and eventually killing them.

This practice was common all over the country in the 19th and early 20th centuries and frequently occurred in the South until the 1970s. It seems unimaginable that we could "honor" the Wildcat defense by the use of such a term.

While I believe a nickname is appropriate for K-State's powerful defense, I think we have a responsibility to come up with one that does not hearken back to some of the most horrific, racist incidents in American history.

Union Governing Board tables proposal of 1,200-pound wildcat

LAURA POPE
staff reporter

Union Governing Board tabled a motion Monday to accept a proposal for a sculpture of the Powercat from Deggingers' Foundry.

Deggingers' Foundry of Topeka would like to donate the -foot by 6-foot bronze sculpture to the K-State Student Union. The placement and the funding behind the 1,200-pound sculpture are still in question, resulting in the tabled motion.

Union Director Bernard Pitts said he was seeking the approval of the concept from UGB and Union Enhancement Committee.

The sculpture is not free-standing and will require a structure to be placed on, Pitts said. The south side of the Union or a structure built in the the Union Plaza, between the Union and Seaton Hall, are two locations being discussed.

"I suggested the plaza area," Pitts said. "A $500,000 contribution from the university would help to pay for some of the costs. The Union would also contribute equally. The funding would then come from both."

The sculpture proposal also faced other questions about the funding. In a proposal acceptance letter to Pitts from John Fairman, assistant vice president for university relations, it was suggested that the sculpture be used as a centerpiece to recognize donors for a given university fund-raising campaign.

UGB members said they wanted to know if the KSU Alumni Association was planning to take donations for the sculpture or if it would be a gift to the Union. Pitts plans to relay UGB members' concerns to the Alumni Association and respond at the next meeting.

Other business included a report on the Union enhancement project. Pitts said the 90-percent construction drawings were being approved with exception to the critical path design.

Once approved, the remaining 10 percent of drawings would be turned in. With final approval, a general contractor would be hired.

"Around late March, the beginning of April, we should see some construction on the project," Pitts said. "We can now see some light at the end of the tunnel."

Presentations to university staff will be underway this week to help answer concerns for space and services that will be hindered during construction, Pitts said.

Commerce Bank will be invited to revisit the UGB Executive Committee on Monday, concerning the previously proposed check-cashing fee. The Executive Committee will then give a recommendation to the general body at the following meeting.

A letter requesting bids for the space allocated in the Union enhancement project for a burger establishment has been sent out. All food services registered with the Riley County Health Department were contacted and the deadline to respond is Nov. 7.

Pitts said a decision on a burger establishment should be made around Dec. 12, after mandatory site visits and interviews with those responding.

Parking Services aids K-State-Salina with advice, equipment

LANDON TRAWNY
staff reporter

Parking problems at K-State-Salina are getting some needed attention.

Parking Services is helping K-State-Salina organize a parking council and set up new regulations and guidelines in order to correct the problems.

Kim Sanchez, office assistant for fiscal affairs at K-State-Salina, said part of the problem is K-State-Salina only has 720 students. Student parking permits cost only $17. Faculty and staff permits cost $28.

Sanchez said this lack of revenue has drastically hurt some of the parking lots.

"We have a lot of areas that have deteriorated so they can't be designated as parking lots, so they (K-State Parking Services) are helping us find ways to get funding," Sanchez said.

Darwin Abbott, director of Parking Services, said raising funds could be difficult because tax relief and raising tuition aren't options, according to K-State rules and Kansas laws. He also said although K-State-Salina plans to raise the price of permits to a level consistent with prices at K-State's main campus, this extra revenue wouldn't be enough to correct the situation.

Sanchez said K-State-Salina is looking at possible donation opportunities from businesses in the Salina area.

Lance Lunsway, operations manager of Parking Services, said although Parking Services at the Manhattan campus has limited funds and won't be able to help much financially, it is helping in other ways.

Lunsway said K-State has painted parking stall lines and given old lot designation signs to K-State-Salina to help control some of the problems.

"They've had problems with people parking in the grass," Lunsway said.

Lunsway added that they are reviewing how many parking stalls need to be designated as handicapped stalls and meter stalls.

Abbott said Parking Services purchased a new computer server for $5,000. He said the server has been needed for a while and will allow K-State-Salina to work more closely with Parking Services and the rest of K-State.

Abbott also said K-State has given two portable ticket machines to K-State-Salina in order to curb some of the problems.

Dickie V. may be irritating, but he's good for hoops

It's Halloween, and Dick Vitale is coming to town.

Don't be afraid of Dickie V. Don't cringe at the sight of this man's presence when he walks onto the court in Bramlage Coliseum on Thursday night.

Don't run out to the parking lot with your fingers dug into your ears, screaming and ranting and raving after Dickie V. breaks open K-State's basketball season with a patented, "It's time for basketball, baby!"

VIEWPOINT

D. SCOTT FRITCHEN

D. SCOTT FRITCHEN is a senior in mass communications. You can send your e-mail to Scott at dsf7477@ksu.edu.

If there is a single personality who is synonymous with a sport, it's Vitale and college hoops. Dick Vitale is the ambassador of college basketball.

He's obnoxious. He's hyper. His bald head casts the same reflection under fluorescent lights that a basketball does. He's controversial because he's earned as many enemies as loyalists, but he doesn't let it bother him.

Vitale visits a hundred colleges each year. He brings to life stadiums and coliseums packed full of college students who thrive on college basketball.

Students who buy his basketball preview magazine also practice Vitale's piercing voice while sitting with friends watching ESPN on Thursday nights, and can't wait until March Madness, when college hoops transforms into the monthlong Dickie V. Marathon.

Thursday night, Dickie V. will be in town. K-State's band will be playing. The cheerleaders will be jumping and kicking, and there will be Vitale surrounded by students and fans dressed in purple. He will bring life to a basketball program that must rebound this season.

Coach Tom Asbury agrees. He doesn't say he loves Dickie V., but he doesn't hate him either. Asbury knows Vitale will bring a message to K-State basketball. Subtract Vitale's verbiage and aggressive style and all of the take-it-to-the-hoop-baby's and what you have is a TV commentator who knows college basketball like Marv Albert knows garter belts.

Vitale is wacky, but he's not crazy.

"Like I tell our players," Asbury said, "don't listen to how he says it, but what he says. You may not like his antics or demeanor or the way things come out, but he's done a good job promoting college basketball around the country and around the world."

It still is not clear why Dick Vitale is coming to Manhattan, Kan. Asbury pointed to Mike O'Brien, K-State's associate athletic director of development. O'Brien called Vitale and requested his presence at K-State to speak to a basketball program coming off a 10-17 record.

There is only one Dick Vitale. There are a million colleges. Lawrence is right down the street. Show me the money, baby?

"I thought it would be a good thing for our basketball program," Asbury said. "He doesn't come free, either, but I don't expect him to."

What Asbury expects Vitale to do is spread the message of winning to K-State's basketball team. He wants the college basketball ambassador to spark a program the way only he knows how.

Vitale will yell into television cameras, "It's Ayome May, baby! He's the junior from Lancaster, Texas, baby! He's the money-maker who will lead the Wildcats to the promised land come March, baby!"

The vein on his sweat-beaded forehead will begin to pop out. You will grab the nearest grocery bag and pray the nachos you ate six minutes ago don't come back up. The band will play "Wabash Cannonball" and the basketball team will line up and shoot lay-ups, hoping to improve on 38-percent shooting from the field, which they shot last year.

With each ball that goes through the hoop, Vitale's voice will grow louder, because with every made basket comes another roar from fans and another adrenaline rush for Vitale.

Some fans will leave Thursday night thinking Vitale is an even bigger idiot in person than on television. Others will be so pumped up for basketball season that they'll add the word "baby" to the end of every sentence they speak.

Either way, Asbury will conduct his first public basketball practice of the season. Players will run three-man-weaves and will shoot jump shots and lay-ups. Maybe someone will even dunk.

One thing is for certain. After Thursday, Vitale will have made his mark in Manhattan, baby.

Saturday, linebacker Jeff Kelly entered a contest of his own: a battle with Sooner fans who harassed him because he chose K-State as his college football home instead of Oklahoma.

SURVIVING hostility

STORY BY SAM FELSENFELD

K-State linebacker Jeff Kelly knew he'd have his work cut out for him going into Saturday's game at Oklahoma.

For starters, as middle linebacker, he knew it would be tough having the Sooners' 6-foot-5-inch, 282-pound center, Bruce McClure, coming at him full speed all afternoon.

He also knew he'd have it tough trying to contain Oklahoma's option masters, quarterback Eric Moore and running back De'Mond Parker, a Heisman Trophy candidate.

But the toughest people he had to face Saturday weren't playing for the Sooners. They weren't even sitting on the bench.

They were the fans sitting in the stands, and to put things delicately, they didn't like him.

Kelly is a subject of controversy in Norman because he backed out of a commitment to play with the Sooners so he could be a Wildcat instead.

But there's more to it than that. Kelly, who was the top-rated community college linebacker by several publications last season, originally agreed to play for K-State.

And then he changed his mind and wanted to be a Sooner.

And then he changed his mind and wanted to be a Wildcat — again.

He eventually landed with the Cats, a matter that doesn't rest easily with Sooner fans. And they let him know that.

"The crowd came off as very hostile," Kelly said of Saturday's game.

He said the hostility started during pre-game warm-ups, and the comments he heard weren't very polite.

"They said a lot of stuff," he said. "You know, a lot of family things."

Part of the trouble with the situation involved the way he decided to be a Wildcat the second time. During the week leading up to Saturday's game, Oklahoma coaches alleged that K-State coaches impersonated Sooners coach John Blake and tricked Kelly while trying to regain his services.

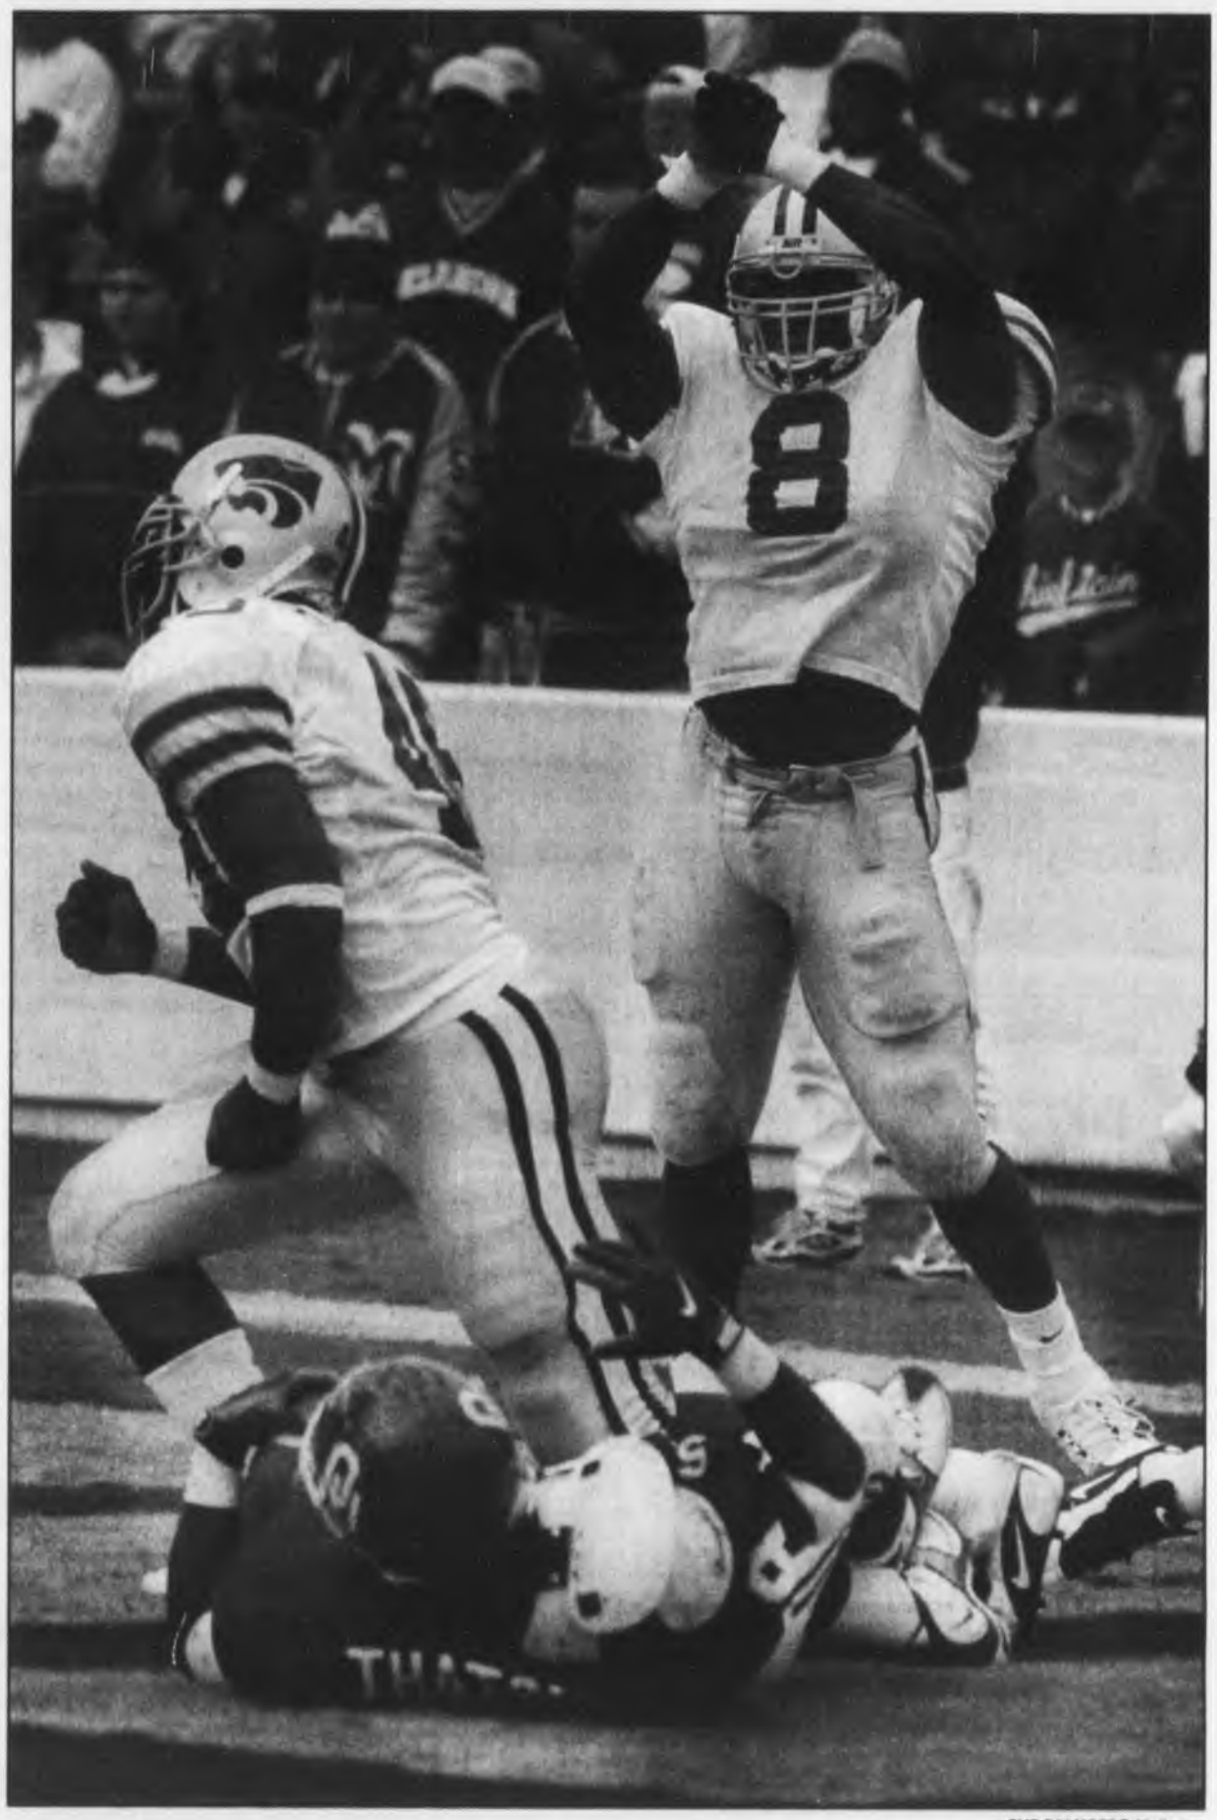
"That's not true at all," Kelly said. "I don't know where they get that. There was nothing like that."

Still, the Oklahoma fans were unhappy with him, and apparently, his family too. But that's fine with Kelly. His family was at the game — the first time they've seen him play Division I-A football.

He said he's happy to have played well in a victory in front of his parents. And he credits, ironically, the Oklahoma fans who said impolite things about Mom and Dad Kelly. He said the heckling was far from bothersome.

"I took that to my advantage," he said. "I used that to help me play hard."

The Cats' 26-7 victory was their fifth consecutive win over the Sooners — a sign of a turnaround, one team on the rise and the other on the decline. After all, even with the five-game losing streak, Oklahoma still leads the all-time series 63-16-4.



Historically, the Sooners have had K-State's number. But not in this decade, perhaps one of the reasons Kelly wears purple, not crimson.

Kelly's not worried about any traditions, though. He's just happy the Cats improved to 6-1 on the season, and that he'll never have to play in Oklahoma again — unless the teams meet in the Big 12 championship game next year.

"With all the bickering going on about where I was going to school, at K-State or OU, it was a great personal win for me," he said.

He was also happy with his decision to play for the Cats. Now that he's seen, and heard, the fans in Norman, he's glad he plays his home games at KSU Stadium.

"Nothing compares to the fans in Manhattan," he said.

Looking back at Lon

Ex-Wildcat coach, player enjoying success at Illinois

Although K-State's men's basketball team didn't reach the NCAA Tournament a year ago, K-State had a representative. It also had one in the 1994 Final Four.

While the Wildcats weren't there, one of the most famous Wildcats was. University of Illinois head basketball coach Lon Kruger has taken the path through K-State to become one of the most successful college basketball coaches in the country.

Kruger

After being away from K-State, Kruger said he has some great memories.

"There are so many. My favorite memory goes back to the teammates I played with," he said. "I maintain close contact and communication with basically all of them. The opportunity to play for Coach (Jack) Hartman was an absolutely terrific experience."

Kruger arrived at K-State in 1970 and began playing in the '71-'72 season, because freshmen weren't allowed to compete at the time. He is 14th on K-State's career scoring list, and is one of only two Wildcats to be named the Big Eight's Player-of-the-Year twice.

Kruger was an assistant for legendary coach Hartman, for whom he also played, starting in 1978. He stayed until 1982, when he accepted the head coaching job at Texas-Pan American. When Hartman retired in 1986, Kruger replaced his former coach.

Kruger said it was special for him to come back to coach at K-State.

"You can never feel about another school like you do your alma mater," Kruger said.

Kruger was at K-State for four years, and is the only coach to lead the Cats to four-consecutive NCAA Tournament trips. He was also the first coach to win 20 games in his first campaign.

He led the 1987-88 team to the Midwest Regional Finals before losing to eventual national champion Kansas.

He then went to the University of Florida in 1990, where he took a team that was struggling to the Final Four in only four years.

"At Kansas State, the challenge was to maintain the tradition," Kruger said. "The opportunity at Florida presented a totally different challenge. They were in turmoil with the NCAA investigation and the FBI scandal. To see players come in there and conduct themselves in a way to totally chance the perception people had of Florida basketball ... there was satisfaction in that."

Kruger said going to the Final Four was a special experience, one that he wished the '88 K-State team could have experienced.

"The players meshed extremely well together," he said. "In Florida, we realized how much we missed by being only a game short in '88."

He left Florida for Illinois in 1996, where he replaced another retiring legend, Lou Henson.

"The opportunity to get back to the Midwest, where basketball is really significant and exciting, was really appealing," he said.

In his first season at Illinois last year, the team compiled a 22-10 record and reached the second round of the NCAA Tournament a year after the team missed the tournament altogether.

Although he is happy at Illinois, Kruger says there are some things he misses about K-State.

"I miss the ties to the tradition," he said. "At Illinois, for instance, I'm aware, but I don't really feel what happened 15 years ago like I did at Kansas State."

Looking back on more successful times at K-State, he fondly recalls the glory days of the basketball program and the atmosphere surrounding it.

"Another memory is the unbelievable atmosphere and rabid support of the fans in Ahearn as a player, and in Ahearn and Bramlage as a coach. The fans there were very special," he said. "Ahearn had that special quality where people just went in there expecting to make it rock. It was a great home-court advantage."

Men's crew faring well despite tight budget

MICHAEL RYAN
staff reporter

Like every other athlete who competes on a K-State athletic team, the men who make up the rowing team pay a price.

Unlike most teams, however, this team actually has to pay money to support itself because it is not a recognized varsity sport. It is a club sport.

Each member of the team has to pay $80 for dues each semester. The dues go toward purchasing equipment and other various fees the team has to pay, Coach Al Koch said.

Members also have to pay an additional fee for travel expenses, and they participate in fund-raisers each year.

Despite the financial obligation, Koch's crew is the largest it has been in the past five years with 22 varsity rowers and 16 novice rowers. However, Koch did say the team does lose rowers because the athletes can't afford it.

Because there is very little high school rowing in Kansas, Koch doesn't recruit his rowers at the lake but instead on campus. Most of the rowers on the team were recruited at freshman orientation, fee payment and All-University Open House.

The crew team is split into three divisions — lightweight, open, and heavyweight. The lightweight consists of men of 160 pounds and less, and the heavyweight is men who weigh more than160 pounds.

The open division is described by Koch as the "cream of the crop" because there are no weight restrictions. Koch has been happy so far.

"They're both (open and lightweight) very good crews," Koch said. "They work hard and they get along, that's the two best things I can hope for. They have the most potential I've ever coached."

The varsity crew practices from 5:45 to 7:45 a.m. five days a week in the fall and spring. The novice crew practices from 5 to 6:45 p.m. on the same days.

If you're interested in finding out more about the men's rowing team or wish to join the team contact Al Koch at 537-1452.

Dorodnova loses to ranked player at Indiana, takes 2nd

JOEL WHITE

K-State tennis player Yana Dorodnova kept her hot streak alive over the weekend as she advanced to the first-place match in the Hoosier Classic in Bloomington, Ind.

However, top-seeded Dorodnova was not able to continue the hot streak all the way through as she fell in the championship match to Barbara Navarro of Baylor.

The No. 2 seed Navarro, who is currently ranked 39th in the nation, defeated Dorodnova 6-3, 3-6, 7-5.

Ahead 4-2 in the third set, Dorodnova began to give way to Navarro, losing five out of the last six games.

Head coach Steve Bietau said the championship win was within Dorodnova's reach, but she let it slip away.

"She lost focus and made some mistakes that cost her the match," he said.

Dorodnova's first step on the road to the championship match was a 6-1, 6-2 thrashing of Indiana's Jessica Anderson in the first round. She then dispensed of Baylor's Hortensia Hernandez 6-1, 6-2, to advance to the final.

Dorodnova's second-place finish in the Hoosier Classic followed her outstanding performance in the Arizona State Invitational Oct. 11 and 12. In the Arizona State Invitational, she knocked off two nationally ranked opponents en route to the third-place match.

Playing in the second flight of the tournament, senior Lena Piliptchak won her final match of the tournament with a third-place win over Ana Ceretto of Indiana. Piliptchak defeated Ceretto 3-6, 6-2, 6-3 in the third-place match.

Helping DB92 talk shows survive

Station manager changes format

SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
staff writer

It almost didn't survive into this semester, but "A Purple Affair" on KSDB-FM 91.9 is back and, according to the people behind it, is better than ever.

Having changed the station's format, station manager Len Potillo said some faculty members wanted to eliminate the talk shows altogether. Critics saw the opinion-based shows as a clash with the higher tempo musical format.

Potillo considered the shows in need of change, not annihilation. Modeling the radio talk shows after their more energetic television counterparts, Potillo said the goal was to make the host take less of a "radio personality" role and assume more of a "host/mediator" role toward the guest or guests on the show.

"A Purple Affair" aired Monday through Friday in the past. The show has now been split into two shows. "Campus Life" now covers issues specific to K-State on Wednesdays. The new "A Purple Affair" broadcasts on Monday and Thursday and focuses more on general-interest issues and entertainment. Both shows air from 5 until 6 p.m.

According to staffers Kelly Flynn, junior in advertising, and Jeremy Claeys, sophomore in political science and electronic journalism, the changes have made "A Purple Affair" a better show. The show being cut back was the most obvious change.

"We were mad at first, but it turned out to be a blessing," Flynn said.

Claeys said he agreed. "We have time to book real shows and make something we can be proud of," he said.

He said with the extra time between shows, guests are easier to book and will now be a constant feature instead of having occasional guests as in past semesters.

Flynn described the original format as "always two people firing off their opinions." With the new setup, she said the staff wanted to move away from that.

"It's not about us," Claeys said. "We don't want it to be about us."

Potillo said he also wants the staff on shows like "A Purple Affair" to be anything but set in stone.

"I want it to be changing constantly from show to show to give everybody an opportunity to be on the air," Potillo said.

Claeys said not only does having guests make the show better listening, but the guests are certainly more qualified to discuss the day's topic than the co-hosts alone.

"We want to moderate instead of bearing the brunt of the discussion. We want professionals to do that," Claeys said. "We just want to get the information out on both sides of the issues. It adds credibility to the show."

Another change that wasn't exactly planned, Flynn said, was the live remote crew with Tim Peltzer and Aaron Fish traveling around Manhattan to gather local opinions.

"It was very spontaneous, but I think it was a good idea," Flynn said.

The remote crew travels around in a car that Fish and Peltzer painted lime green. It has been dubbed "The Magic Mystery Machine."

"Tim is our wild man on staff. He'll do anything you ask," Flynn said. She said the advantage behind such a remote crew comes when the show tackles a sensitive issue.

"We'll have a break in the seriousness with Tim and Aaron," Flynn said.

Some things will remain the same. "A Purple Affair" will still broadcast live from the third floor of McCain Auditorium. "A Purple Affair" will still welcome callers during the show, but they will now be screened before going on the air and will be limited to two calls per guest.

As for the future, Potillo said with local commercial stations wandering with format choices, "DB92 basically owns the urban and alternative format. I'd like us to become more of a force to rival the commercial stations and continue to make them a little nervous."

Potillo said he is dedicating this semester to "getting the kinks out of everything," and getting the staff accustomed to the format changes before he tries to increase department funding and possibly begin negotiations for a station move.

Claeys said the commodity "A Purple Affair" needs is more applicants for the research and writing staff.

JEREMY CLAEYS, sophomore in electronic journalism and political science, discusses issues dealing with HIV with Kelly Flynn, junior in advertising. Claeys and Flynn are the hosts for Purple Affair, on KSDB-FM 91.9.

DURAN DURAN molds '80s, '90s in style

LANDON TRAWNY
staff reporter

Music Review

The '80s were notorious for one-hit wonders. Only a few bands were able to cross into the '90s without losing their trademark sounds.

Duran Duran seems to have had the toughest road, however. Never being a favorite band of critics in the music industry, dealing with a break-up and going through as many group members as they had hairstyles, Duran Duran has emerged once again in the thick of things.

They are a trio once again. Bassist and founding member John Taylor has left Duran Duran to pursue different musical interests. Only the vocals of Simon LeBon and the keyboards of Nick Rhodes remain from the original group. Ex-Missing Persons guitarist Warren Cuccurullo rounds out the group.

Duran Duran's new release, "Medazzaland," stays true to the group's relentless pursuit of pioneering different directions for rock.

When first listening to the album, it was a bit of a shock. I actually checked the compact disc player to make sure I had the right disc in.

The overall sound of "Medazzaland" is a mix between techno, industrial, rock and electronic. The music was woven together in a way that made me wonder if I was in the '80s or the '90s. After listening on, I really didn't care. It was catchy.

The second track, "Big Bang Generation," proved to me it was indeed Duran Duran. The song started out with a carnival-ride sound along with LeBon's crooning voice and loopy lyrics, "Falling into space. At the end of time, black as the black in your eyes. Staring through a hole in the ozone. There's nobody home, to play back your answer-phone." This song was like riding a carousel with strobe lights. At the end, I got back in line for another ride.

The third track, "Electric Barbarella," is a tribute to Jane Fonda's cult-hit movie, "Barbarella," which is where Duran Duran found its name. This song is the current release and can be heard on KSDB-FM 91.9.

Inventive keyboard and guitar riffs really make this another fun song to dance to. Once again, LeBon has fun with the lyrics as he sings about a mannequin making the perfect girlfriend.

The fourth track, "Out Of My Mind," was released earlier this summer on "The Saint" soundtrack. This song is the closest you can get to the sounds of the band's last album of original music. If you can imagine being in love and walking alone on the watery streets of Venice during a pleasant snowfall, you can probably imagine how the song goes. Another winner.

Other songs like "Silva Halo," "Be My Icon," "Buried in the Sand" and "So Long Suicide" score high on this album.

When I first heard "Silva Halo," I thought I was listening to Nine Inch Nails. The only difference was Trent Reznor would have sung about something dismal and named the song "Rusted Crooked Halo."

Another song I really enjoyed was "Midnight Sun." It incorporates a cello and has a slow beat that is entrancing. LeBon's vocals in this song are mesmerizing and will pull you in all the way. If you are sad, the song will sound sad. If you are happy, the song will be pleasant and relaxing.

"Medazzaland" is one of those albums that can catch you off guard at first but really grows on you fast. If you like new sounds for techno, dancing, crazy lyrics or are just a rabid Duran Duran fan, you should enjoy the album. If you don't fall into any of those categories, give it a try. You just might be surprised.

If you get the chance, I recommend a visit to "Medazzaland." It's like going to Disney World. There are tons of things to enjoy and explore.

God Street Wine encourages listeners to ponder issues

Music Review

Next time you pack your bags for a road trip, be sure to throw in "God Street Wine" on Mercury Records. It's an album to slip into your compact disc player when you feel the need to take a drive and think about life.

The self-titled album blends the sounds of the Allman Brothers, Blues Traveler and Tom Petty to create a somber mode of bluesy relaxation.

Be sure to give "A Good Dream" a listen. It reminisces about a past relationship colored with fond memories. As reality approaches, the brilliant hues of love dim to black. Listen to the colorful metaphors and remember that long-lost love, or maybe just that feeling.

If this drags you down too much, try "Happy Birthday, Mr. President." It picks up the tempo a bit. Tap along to the strong mix of guitar, bass and drums. This light ditty speaks of an eternal president to save the day, comparing the president to a superhero. Whether or not President Clinton wears a cape and flies through the air, it reveres the president as a figure respected for his healing and problem solving. Consider your role as a citizen and your reverence for national leaders. This song might anger you or perhaps inspire you to take a more active role in government.

The five-member band gives this album a splash of conscience, a little religion and a touch of emotion. Its thought-provoking lyrics question social concerns, such as the role of the president, but in a light manner. The lyrics encourage listeners to think — about their nation, about their loved ones and about themselves.

Take a little time to ponder the issues God Street Wine presents, intermixed with some suave instrumentals. The combination works well for this band, as it has for other groups of blues-influenced rock.

Greeks to participate in Fright Night II

COLE EHMKE
staff reporter

Fraternities and sororities will sponsor Halloween festivities for children on Bramlage Coliseum's concourse before Fright Night II begins Thursday.

Greeks will hand out candy and sponsor pumpkin coloring, cookie decorating and a haunted house, Lindsey Roy, Panhellenic Council member and coordinator of the event, said at Monday's Panhellenic Council meeting. The council governs 11 of K-State's sororities.

"It will give kids a safe, warm environment to go trick-or-treating," Roy said.

The activities begin at 6:30 p.m. and run until 8 when the Fright Night program begins. Fright Night lets fans meet K-State men's and women's basketball teams.

This is the first year greeks will help with Fright Night. The idea of the greek system working with the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics and ICAT board came out of a desire to increase participation in Fright Night and provide greeks with a philanthropy.

"We're doing this to give back to the Manhattan community," Roy said. "We'll promote our image while doing something good for the community."

Thirty-five booths, including some sponsored by residence halls and businesses, will be at the event as well, Roy said. The booths are designed to give more options and more participation to the children, she said. Free T-shirts will be given to the first 1,000 people who arrive.

The main Fright Night program features an appearance by ESPN basketball commentator Dick Vitale, skits and scrimmages by the basketball teams, basketball contests for fans, Willie the Wildcat, the Classy Cats, cheerleaders and a Dick Vitale sound-alike contest.

The greek chapter with the highest percentage of members at Fright Night wins a Dick Vitale autographed basketball, which will be awarded at the Nov. 17 women's basketball game.

Arkansas 6-2, 6-4 in the first round. She then had a 6-3, 6-4 loss to Indiana's Christy Sharp in the second round, knocking her into the third-place match.

Bietau said Piliptchak's performance, especially her serve, was very solid.

"She beat some quality opponents, and had as impressive performance as anyone on the team," he said.

The Cats' second player in the top flight of the tournament, freshman Anna Pampoulova, finished in sixth place with a final match loss to Andrea Ho from Arkansas. She was defeated 6-2, 6-3.

Pampoulova lost to Baylor's Hernandez 6-4, 6-4 in the first round, but she defeated Jessica Anderson of Indiana 6-4, 5-7, 6-1 to advance to the fifth-place match.

Freshman Eva Novotna took fifth place in the second flight with a 6-1, 4-6, 7-5 win over Kendra Howard of Arkansas.

Novotna lost her first round match to Louise Ostling of Arkansas 6-4, 3-6, 6-3. In the consolation bracket, Novotna defeated Baylor's Sophie Goldschmidt 6-1, 6-3, to advance to the fifth-place match.

The Wildcats now turn their attention to the highlight of the fall season, the Rolex Regional Championships in Omaha, Neb., from Oct. 29 to Nov. 2.

Bietau said the Hoosier Classic was a good preparation for the Rolex Regional Championships.

"For the most part, we're beating the people we should beat, and as we're progressing, we're getting some quality wins," he said. "I feel good going into the Rolex."

Students' dilemma

New tax credit creates uncertainty about when to pay college tuition

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CONCORD, N.H. — Here's a bonus math problem for college freshmen and sophomores: Should students pay their spring tuition when it's due in December? Or should they wait until Jan. 1 and take advantage of the new $1,500 tuition tax credit?

Tom Macko, whose son, Tim, is a freshman at Onondaga Community College in Syracuse, N.Y., says the answer is easy, "I would probably defer to January — I'd be stupid not to."

Not so fast, college administrators and tax specialists say.

To get the right answer, students and parents need to figure out a few other things first, such as how the student will be penalized; whether tuition is high enough to make it worthwhile; and if the person claiming the deduction is in the right income bracket.

The one-time-only dilemma facing an estimated 4 million freshmen and sophomores results from the HOPE Scholarship — actually a tax credit — included in the budget deal struck by President Clinton and Congress in July.

Freshmen and sophomores might qualify if they pay tuition on or after Jan. 1, 1998. But the due date for spring semester tuition at many colleges falls in early December.

The HOPE credit poses a dilemma for colleges, too.

The University of New Hampshire thought about delaying its registration deadline until after the New Year, but decided against it because it would be too costly, says spokeswoman Carol Sendak. Students paying after Dec. 11 will be charged a $100 late fee.

At Michigan State, students might not be able to get into the classes they want if they fail to register by the Dec. 10 deadline.

"As we get closer to the semester, we want students to put down the earnest money," says university controller David Brower. "It's very important for us to have the advance information about what the enrollments are going to be so we can make adjustments."

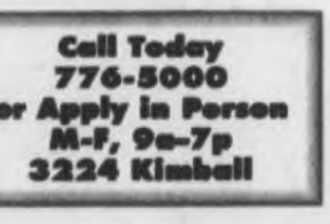
With roughly 6,000 sophomores, Michigan State also faces a crunch in processing financial aid for students who register after Jan. 1, Brower says. Still, the university is considering pushing back the registration deadline just this once.

"We may just throw up our hands and wait till after the first of the year and then try to be flexible with parents and students," Brower says.

The HOPE credit covers 100 percent of the first $1,000 in tuition and mandatory fees, minus scholarship money, and 50 percent of the next $1,000 for first- and second-year students.

To get the full credit, a single taxpayer must make enough to pay taxes but earn less than $40,000 a year in adjusted gross income, while married taxpayers must make less than $80,000. Singles making up to $50,000 and couples making up to $100,000 will get a partial credit.

For Tom Macko, a sixth-grade teacher, paying late is the clear choice.



His wife works for a health maintenance organization and their combined income is less than $80,000. Tuition for Tim Macko is about $1,300 each semester, so Tom Macko can only take full advantage of the credit if he pays for both semesters in 1998.

But his choice won't cost him a late fee, as it will for parents at other colleges. That's because Onondaga, which is part of the State University of New York system, has pushed back its tuition due date from late December to Jan. 14.

"We knew students would want to take advantage of the credit where they could," says college spokeswoman Patricia Torrey. "Is that responsive or what?"

CLASSIFIED AD WRITING TIPS

- List items or services first. Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.
- Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.
- Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

a trading day that had just 30 minutes remaining.

The NYSE planned to open today at its normal hour to resume trading.

The whirlwind on Wall Street reflects concerns about Southeast Asia's shaky economies, where mounting trade deficits have sent interest rates soaring and local currencies plunging.

Feeding the market free-fall were concerns that the bull market is ending.

"The market is irrational in both directions," said Brian Belski, technical analyst at Dain Bosworth in Minneapolis, Minn. "For a long time it was looking for any evidence to push it up. Now, the mood has gloomed and investors are looking for reasons to sell."

While stocks slumped, U.S. Treasury bonds bucked the trend as investors sought safer places to put their cash until the equity markets steady. The rise in bond prices pushed the yield on the 30-year Treasury — a key influence on borrowing costs — down toward its lowest level since early 1996.

The Nasdaq composite index fell a record 115.83 to 1,535.09, hurt by a plunge in technology stocks. It was more than twice the previous biggest point drop. The 7-percent slide was the fourth-biggest ever.

"I had to come," he said. "They were doing this for me. I had to be there."

Each team took pledges per mile that was traveled. It is estimated that $5,000-$6,000 was raised by pledges and various other donations.

Alpha Tau Omega President Jon Freeman, senior in biology, said he thinks it is important for the house to support Rhoades.

"We spend so much money on other causes, it is absolutely essential that we support our own brother," he said.

The house is asking every member to donate 10 cents a mile, which figures out to be $12 per person. Additionally, ATO will donate part of the money it raises during its spring philanthropy to the John Rhoades Medical Fund.

People with cystic fibrosis suffer from chronic lung problems and digestive disorders.

Cystic fibrosis used to be known as a children's disease, and the life expectancy for people with it used to be very short.

Today, due to medical advances, the median life expectancy is around 25 years. Rhoades celebrated his 24th birthday in May.

"John's one of my best friends. I've watched him suffer with cystic fibrosis, and I want him to have the opportunity to have this chance," Cherra said. "He's doing a lot better than a lot of people, but it gets progressively worse."

It is estimated that the first year after the transplant has been completed, Rhoades' medical bills will total $250,000.

The money raised by the "120 Milhouse Mile to Manhattan" will be put into the John Rhoades Medical Fund, which will go toward his transplant.

positive tenure decision at the appropriate time."

El-Ghori's suit said the dean's review was "largely disregarded" at his tenure review. If El-Ghori's performance as a faculty member was lacking, the suit argues, Nicholls was "grossly negligent" by not informing him.

El-Ghori called on the faculty grievance committee to hear his case after his tenure was denied. The suit claims he was able to prove the university's failure to comply with its own tenure process.

However, Jon Wefald, as president of K-State, upheld Nicholls' original recommendation and again denied El-Ghori's tenure. For this, El-Ghori names Wefald and the university in the suit.

Nicholls and Pearce both declined comment. Grimes could not be reached.

$15,000 at the beginning of the year to spend on that year's expenses and whatever money exceeds the $100,000 cap will go back to the privilege fee reserves account.

"If you give us more money, then more money transfers back into your account giving you more flexibility in the long run," Thomas said.

The committee amended the bill for Student Publications Inc.'s equipment fee, which was introduced to Student Senate on Thursday.

The Committee and Student Publications have been debating the equipment fee for weeks. The fee, originally funded for four years, was cut to two years and now is up for review for a second two years.

Members of the Privilege Fee Committee sent the Student Publication equipment fee to Senate, but did so unfavorably. Aaron Truax, committee vice chair, said he could not support an additional two years when Senate already decided on two years.

"I personally feel that this allows us the utmost control of the fee," Truax said. "Senate passed this for two years, and I think it should stay that way."

GAME

'90s often need to be convinced and encouraged that a future is even possible for them. He said students need to be exposed to new and exciting career choices. They also need to develop basic skills to manage their own futures instead of relying on someone else to do it.

The K-State Stock Market Game is open to everyone in Kansas. There are four divisions: elementary, middle school, high school and college, which includes anyone else who wants to participate.

The game consists of teams investing a hypothetical $100,000 for a 10-week period, in common stocks listed on the American Stock Exchange, the Nasdaq Stock Market and the New York Stock Exchange.

The simulation is offered in two formats. Participants can play the game using either pre-printed scan sheets that they mail in each week or via the Internet. An entry fee of $20 per team is assessed to cover mailing and communication costs.

The top 5 percent of teams that earn the most money receive medals, and certificates are issued to everyone who participates.

The next 10-week session will begin Feb. 13 for the scan sheets and Feb. 14 on the Internet. The online version will also be available during the summer.

Faculty pay raises inconsistent with cost of living increases

▶ Is this a good thing?
The editorial board feels the salary increases hurt the quality of education.

APRYL MATHES
staff writer

Salaries for K-State faculty members have not kept up with cost-of-living increases, nor have raises been comparable to those of central administrators.

James Coffman, University provost, said salaries are not adjusted based on inflation rates.

"Raises are based on annual performance," Coffman said. "The department heads and the dean have a role in determining the merit of the faculty."

Every individual department has its own system for evaluating faculty, Martin Ottenheimer, professor of anthropology, said.

"Usually one is evaluated on the basis of service, research and teaching," he said.

That can mean a faculty member mght not receive a raise at all.

"There's no cost of living increase for all practical purposes," Coffman said. "Raises are determined on a merit system exclusively."

Coffman said the average salary increase in the past seven years, for both faculty and administration, has been around 3 percent.

"In a few isolated cases, there will be larger increases," Coffman said. "But the big middle is going to be a lot closer to the average."

However, when those isolated cases involve top administration, it tends to be a big concern for some faculty.

"On average, we are assured that they are about the same percentage," Jim Legg, Faculty Senate president, said. "The problem is that people tend to notice the top administrators and compare their raises to the average faculty raise."

Pat Bosco, dean of students life, received a salary increase from $84,200 to $97,500, an increase of 13.64 percent.

In the same fiscal year, the increase was 4.56 percent for both Coffman and Bob Krause, vice president for institutional advancement.

Jim Struve, director of the budget office, completes a comparison report of faculty and administrative increases.

"Based upon 'near final' calculations, I show that the average faculty salary increase was 4.04 percent, the administrative increase was 3.81 percent and the increase for all staff in my study was 4 percent," Struve said.

A source of tension with faculty, Ottenheimer said, was that while the average administrative salary increase was lower than faculty, the distribution of that increase was sometimes lopsided.

"When you take a look at central administration, you see 5-percen raises and higher," he said. "People start wondering about it."

However, Coffman said the general procedure is to keep faculty salary increases higher than those o administration.

Committee looks into distribution of Vet Med funds

MATT KREPS
staff writer

The Faculty Affairs Committee of Faculty Senate is sending a letter to the Provost's Office detailing concerns about the distribution of funds by the College of Veterinary Medicine.

The committee received concerns from faculty members within the college about how certain funds were distributed for teaching and research awards.

The committee reviewed the concerns and decided to pass the matter to the Provost's Office for further review.

"We have come to the conclusion that there is reason to be concerned," Brad Fenwick, committee chair, said.

Fenwick stepped away from leading the review because he is a faculty member in veterinary medicine. George Keiser, from the Department of English led the committee in this case.

"It's a question of whether there's been a misuse of funds," Keiser said.

Keiser said money is given in a variety of ways to support teaching and research initiatives and to reward individuals for specific accomplishments.

The question the committee had was whether faculty had the opportunity to apply and compete for the money.

"My understanding is that it is a matter of disagreement of how the funds were distributed," Provost James Coffman said.

The committee's letter to the Provost's Office will communicate the specific concerns. After that, the matter will be handled by that office, Keiser said.

Despite the inquiry, there is no proof of any errors or wrongdoings, Keiser said.

"This kind of thing can easily be nothing at all, or it can be something," he said.

The Dean's Office of the College of Veterinary Medicine declined to comment, asking that all inquiries be directed to the Provost's Office.

New course taught on World Wide Web

LAURA POPE
staff reporter

"Power teaching" describes the newest course taught on the World Wide Web by the Department of Electrical and Computer Engineering.

The metaphor is used to describe a class that deals with power systems and distribution, Anil Pahwa, professor of electrical and computer engineering, said.

"The way we are doing it had become very powerful," Pahwa said.

The course, Flexible Control of Distribution Systems, is taught using a computer hooked up to a big-screen television. A three-way conference call is set up using a speakerphone in the middle of the room.

> "We felt we each had expertise in our area, and if we got together we can really do neat things."
> • Anil Pahwa
> professor of electrical and computer engineering

The University of Missouri-Rolla and the University of Arkansas are connected with K-State by the telephone. All three places have access to the material taught through a Web site. The course is taught by initiating a session before class on the Web. The link is only usable during class time.

Three students are enrolled in the course at K-State, one is enrolled in Missouri and a professor is in Arkansas.

Kraig Olejniczak, associate professor at the University of Arkansas, will teach the second half of the course to the students.

Video tapes were made for the students at other universities in the past and shipped to them within two days, Pahwa said.

"The original intent was to have interaction somehow," Shelli Starrett, assistant professor of electrical and computer engineering, said. "The video tapes were just a beginning."

Pahwa said the video tapes weren't successful because there was no interaction between the students and the professor. Students who watched the tapes couldn't ask questions.

Starrett, who taught the course last fall, said the deapartment has also tried video conferencing. However, this had to be done by renting space in Dole Hall and there were often problems with the resolution and clarity of the text, she said.

After listening to a speaker on campus, the idea of an Internet course was initiated, Starrett said.

"We could do it all in our own building," she said. "The only thing we lost was seeing the people live, but the students can still type on the screen and the telephone offers voice interaction. We wanted to keep the interaction as much as we could like a classroom."

The course originated from a group of five teachers in electrical and computer engineering from the three universities. Pahwa described the course as a joint effort by the group.

"We felt we each had expertise in our area and if we got together we can really do neat things," he said.

The group wrote a proposal to the National Science Foundation asking to create two classes, the current class and Flexible Control of Transmission Systems. Members contributed to the proposal by writing about their area of expertise.

The proposal was submitted along with 442 others from across the country. Fifty-nine proposals were then submitted to the second stage and 15 received grants, Pahwa said.

City defends merits of Anderson Avenue proposal

campus government editor

The expansion of Anderson Avenue from 16th Street to Sunset Avenue has sparked controversy from some community members, but Manhattan city officials defend the merits of the proposal.

Messer

Jack Messer, Manhattan city engineer, said the goal of the project is to provide a safer Anderson Avenue.

"It's going to reduce congestion and potential left-turn accidents," he said.

Bill Muir, member of the Anderson Avenue steering committee and assistant to the vice president for institutional advancement, agreed the project will reach its goal of decreasing congestion.

MacFarland

"The purpose is to relieve the congestion on Anderson Avenue between Sunset and 16th Street and especially between 17th and Denison, where it is exasperating."

However, some Manhattan residents believe decreasing congestion should not come at the expense of pedestrian safety.

Dave MacFarland, associate professor of journalism and member of Anderson Widening Area Residents' Enclave, a citizens' awareness group against the project, said pedestrian safety should have been considered more.

"I can see why something that would improve safety would be desirable, but it's safety for people in cars basically," MacFarland said. "I contend that because so little is being done for pedestrians and bicyclists that safety for those people is actually made worse."

See PROPOSAL, Page 12

WANT TO GET INVOLVED?

A public information meeting about the expansion of Anderson Avenue will be at 6 p.m. Nov. 13 in Union 212.

WANT TO BE INFORMED?

- The cost of the Anderson expansion is projected to be $6.85 million.
- The roadway project itself will cost about $3.5 million, with the Kansas Department of Transportation funding 75 percent of that cost.
- The rest will come from several funding areas with the city, including the storm management fund, the City/University Tax Fund and a general obligation bond.
- The project will expand Anderson Avenue from 16th Street to Sunset Avenue. A left-turn lane will stretch the length of the project and a right-turn lane for northbound turns from Anderson to Denison avenues will be added.

Anderson expansion project may affect foot traffic

campus editor

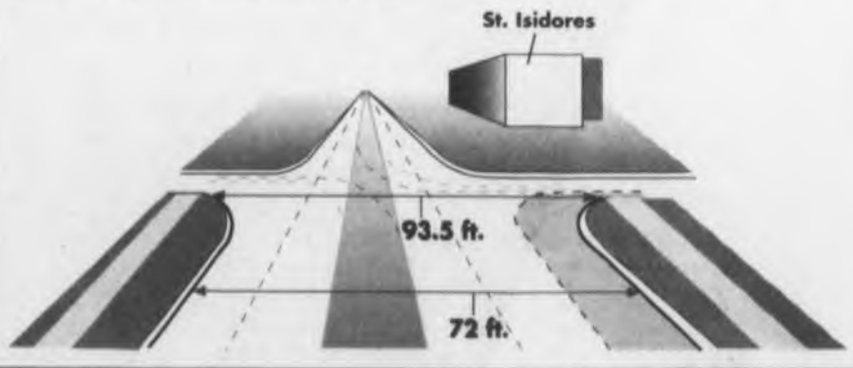
If the proposed Anderson Avenue expansion project is approved, students living on the south side of campus will have to cross up to two extra lanes and an additional 45 feet to reach campus.

Foot traffic is also significant to neighborhood businesses and students attending mass at St. Isidore's University Chapel.

"We have a little over 2,000 students who walk to church every weekend and a significant amount of students who cross Anderson," Keith Weber, chaplain at St. Isidore's, said.

Few trees on the St. Isidore's property will be removed, but the expansion will significantly change the landscape and add to the noise level inside the church, Weber said.

"It's a mixed feeling for me," he said. "I see a need for better traffic flow but the expansion will impact our space here in terms of sound and traffic closer to our building."



The sound of traffic was a concern for St. Isidore's even before Weber joined the parish in July. Attorney John D. Conderman worked on behalf of St. Isidore's to reach compromises with the city.

To combat the sound problems, St. Isidore's will install double-paned glass over the chapel's stained glass windows. A sound bar-

Widening Anderson Avenue

The intersection at Denison and Anderson avenues will change drastically after the proposed Anderson expansion. A left-turn lane for both directions and a right-turn lane for westbound traffic turning onto Denison will essentially double the width of Anderson. Turning radiuses will be enlarged. The actual crossing distance at the crosswalk will be 93.5 feet. However, the actual width of the road will be 72 feet. New pedestrian crossing lights are designed to change only during intervals of low traffic. This could pose a problem for students trying to get to class.

NEWSrewind

News Rewind collects the top campus, local, state, national and world news from the past 48 hours. Briefs are collected from wire and staff reports.

ABC will appeal Food Lion verdict

CHARLOTTE, N.C. — Even though the jury's punitive damages award in the Food Lion case has been slashed by more than 90 percent, ABC News is following through on its promise to appeal the verdict to a higher court.

The company filed the notice of appeal Monday to the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va.

This summer, the trial judge reduced the punitive damages awarded in January to the North Carolina supermarket chain from $5.5 million to $315,000.

"ABC will challenge the finding that its journalists committed fraud, trespass and a breach of loyalty as well as challenge the imposition of punitive damages," ABC News said in a statement.

Food Lion denied the accuracy of the 1992 "PrimeTime Live" expose that accused it of unsanitary practices, but the company did not sue the network for libel or slander. The grocer instead proved the network lied to get jobs for undercover reporters who then wore spy cameras and hidden recorders.

Man sentenced to lethal injection for killing couple during robbery

MEDFORD, Ore. — When police arrested Robert Acremant for murdering a lesbian couple in a botched robbery, he asked police if they would help him get the death penalty.

Attorneys for Acremant, 29, said he had changed his mind after six months in prison and was hoping for life in prison. But a unanimous jury on Monday sentenced him to die by injection.

The former trucking company efficiency expert looking for money to win back a stripper who had spurned him pleaded guilty to killing Roxanne Ellis, 53, and Michelle Abdill, 42, in December 1995.

After luring them to an apartment, he tried to force them to write him $50,000 in checks from their property management business.

When they refused, he bound and gagged them with duct tape and forced them to lie in the back of a pickup truck next to boxes containing a Christmas tree and a present for Ellis' granddaughter. Each was shot.

Two months before Ellis and Abdill were killed, police say, Acremant shot Scott George of Visalia, Calif., the son of his mother's friend, after a night of drinking in what was supposed to be another robbery. He confessed to that slaying, too, but has not entered a plea and a trial date is pending.

Astronaut to become 1st person to exercise right to vote in space

SPACE CENTER, Houston — For the first time in history, an American astronaut is about to exercise his right to vote while in orbit.

A ballot was sent to David Wolf aboard the Russian space station Mir, thanks to a new Texas law. It was prompted by John Blaha's inability to vote from Mir last year.

Under the old law, an absentee ballot had to be sent by U.S. mail. But in June, Gov. George W. Bush signed a bill saying astronauts registered to vote in Texas — where most of them live — can cast ballots from space.

Using new software developed by NASA, Tony J. Sirvello III, Harris County's elections chief, sent a ballot last week to U.S. flight controllers in Moscow, and they transmitted it to Wolf 240 miles above Earth.

NASA plans to use similar software once the international space station is up and running. Assembly of the station begins next summer.

Beverly Hills importer pleads guilty in faulty condom case

LOS ANGELES — The owner of a Beverly Hills import company pleaded guilty to bribing an inspector to import and distribute defective condoms from Malaysia.

Max Naami, 52, the owner of U.C. Imports, admitted Monday that he offered $2,000 to a Food and Drug Administration inspector as part of a scheme to conceal the distribution of 430,000 potentially defective condoms and continue distribution.

Naami faces up to 14 months in prison when he is sentenced Feb. 6. Assistant U.S. Attorney S. Robert Raskin Jr. said he would try to learn whether anyone was harmed before prosecutors make a sentencing recommendation.

The case led the FDA in May 1996 to warn consumers in seven states not to use condoms distributed under the names Pamitex, Maxi, Black Jack, Magic and Ginza. The states were California, Florida, Michigan, New York, Rhode Island, Tennessee and Texas.

Office schedules visitations, recruits students for K-State

ASHLEY YOULE
staff reporter

Students who spent afternoons meeting with college recruiters understand how much those discussions and impressions became an important factor in deciding where to attend college.

New Student Services in Anderson Hall specializes in high school recruitment.

"A lot goes into setting up a campus visit," Susan Hansen, director of NSS, said. "Here in the office we have 11 students who work during the day. Not only do they do office work, but they are trained tour guides as well."

Some of the duties in the office are scheduling campus visits, preparing materials needed for the visits, preparing special tours and recruiting over the phone as a part of the telecounseling program, Hansen said.

"A lot of the recruitment process starts with the admissions representatives," she said. "They are the ones who go into the schools and suggest to the students to come for a visit."

To be a campus tour guide takes hard work and preparation.

"We have to know everything about K-State, we have to be trained," said Manomay Malathip, tour guide and senior in marketing. "We're a big part of the recruiting process. We are with them for an hour, so we have to be prepared to answer any questions they or their parents might have."

Not only do campus tour guides have to be knowledgeable about the university, but at the same time they have to be able to have fun and present the information in an entertaining way.

"We look for high-energy people who have had a great K-State experience. We like for them to have a team attitude and communication skills," Hansen said.

All tour guides have their own way of giving tours.

"I try not to just point out the buildings," said Sara Reser, tour guide and junior in marketing. "I use my personal experiences about K-State, trying to make friends with the prospective students so they feel we really care about them and their decision to come here."

Most tours begin in Anderson and go to all main points of the campus, including the residence halls.

"My favorite building to talk about is Nichols because it has an interesting history. The students like to see the residence halls. They like to see what living in dorms in college is all about," Reser said.

Tours are given three times a day every weekday, Reser said. "We also give tours on Senior Days, during Homecoming and special group tours," she said.

As a role model, the goal of the tour guide is to familiarize the student with the campus, and to make them feel comfortable here, Malathip said.

"They see K-State how we see it. I love knowing I have an impact on them and their decisions," she said.

"We want to show the prospective students the beautiful surroundings and the wonderful atmosphere here at K-State," Hansen said. "They are making an important decision, and we're just doing our part to make that decision easier."

Wall Street recovers from historic drop

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Wall Street made its best comeback ever Tuesday. From record point drops Monday, stocks turned in record gains Tuesday on volume that surpassed one billion shares for the first time.

While stock prices plummeted in Monday's selling spree, buyers rushed in to pick bargains, aided by announcements from corporate giants like IBM of their own multibillion-dollar share-repurchase plans.

The Dow Jones industrial average, which lost a record 554.26 Monday and dropped an additional 178 points in the first hour of trading Tuesday, dramatically reversed course. The average of 30 blue chips ended the day up a record 337.17 points at 7,498.32. The previous biggest point gain, 257.36 points, came Sept. 2.

Tuesday's 4.7-percent rise in the Dow was the biggest percentage bounce back since the days following the Oct. 19, 1987, crash, when the average plummeted 22.6 percent.

Broad-market indexes also staged an incredible turnaround, including a record rise by the Nasdaq composite index.

"Most people realized that we needed a correction — by any standard the market was overvalued," said Russ Labrasca, senior vice president at Principal Financial Securities of Dallas. "Now, we've had the pullback that brought the market back down and people were ready to buy again."

After three days of heavy losses, capped by Monday's rout, investors bought up stocks Tuesday, the eve of the 68th anniversary of the Great Crash of 1929.

Igniting that rise was a sign of confidence in the stock market from IBM Corp., which announced early in the trading day that it would buy up to $3.5 billion worth of its own stock.

Its move not only pushed its own stock up $9.37 to $99.37, but it also

Volatile stock market leads to active day for Kansas brokers

WICHITA — Kevin Lewis took a lot of calls Tuesday: investors wanting to sell stock, even more looking for bargains and some who just need reassurance.

Monday's historic drop in the stock market, followed by Tuesday's surprising rally, made for a busy day for Lewis, a stock broker for Edward Jones in Derby. But the volatile market wasn't expected to have a large effect on the state's economy or industries.

After a historic 554.26-point drop Monday, the stock market came back with a surprising rally. For every investor who called Lewis wanting to sell stock, there were five more who wanted to buy stocks at the lower prices.

"They are taking advantage of this," Lewis said.

But the rapid ups and down of the market were making some investors uncomfortable.

Quality of university education hurt by diminutive faculty raises

Dean of Student Life Pat Bosco will receive a 13-percent raise next year.

Faculty won't even get enough of a raise to keep up with the cost of living.

Who molds your future more — the professors and instructors who challenge you in your curriculum or the guy who came to your high school to sell K-State?

Students come here expecting the quality of teaching a Kansas Board of Regents school should offer. While administrators play a vital role at K-State, they should not become rich off higher education at the expense of faculty members who are teaching the thinkers of tomorrow.

About one-fourth of the Expository Writing I classes for next semester were closed because there wasn't enough money to pay people to teach them. When this is the case, the administration's worries about students taking classes like College Algebra at nearby community college outposts fall on deaf ears. Students go where the resources exist to serve them.

Perhaps Bosco wouldn't mind sharing some of that 13 percent with some of the departments and colleges. While it's true the money for salaries doesn't come from the same accounts used to operate university programs, the mere idea of money earmarked for higher education used for 13-percent salary increases seems outlandish in such tight fiscal times.

Our tuition fees might go up next semester to help pay for a technology enhancement program. Much like a pretty library with minimal research options, a shiny computer is worthless without someone to show students how to use it.

Though a 13-percent increase for one person might not seem like a lot, perhaps the administration could set a better example by holding themselves to the same standards as the faculty. If things continue in the same vein, we'll have plenty of well-paid administrators and plenty of empty classrooms.

Ivan the Terrible building Manhattan's Roads

VIEWPOINT

JONATHAN WINKLER

JONATHAN WINKLER is a senior in physics. You can send e-mail to Jonathan at jnw@ksu.edu

The City of Manhattan traffic engineers continue their (thankfully) unique tradition of showing the rest of Kansas what not to do when constructing streets and planning traffic control devices.

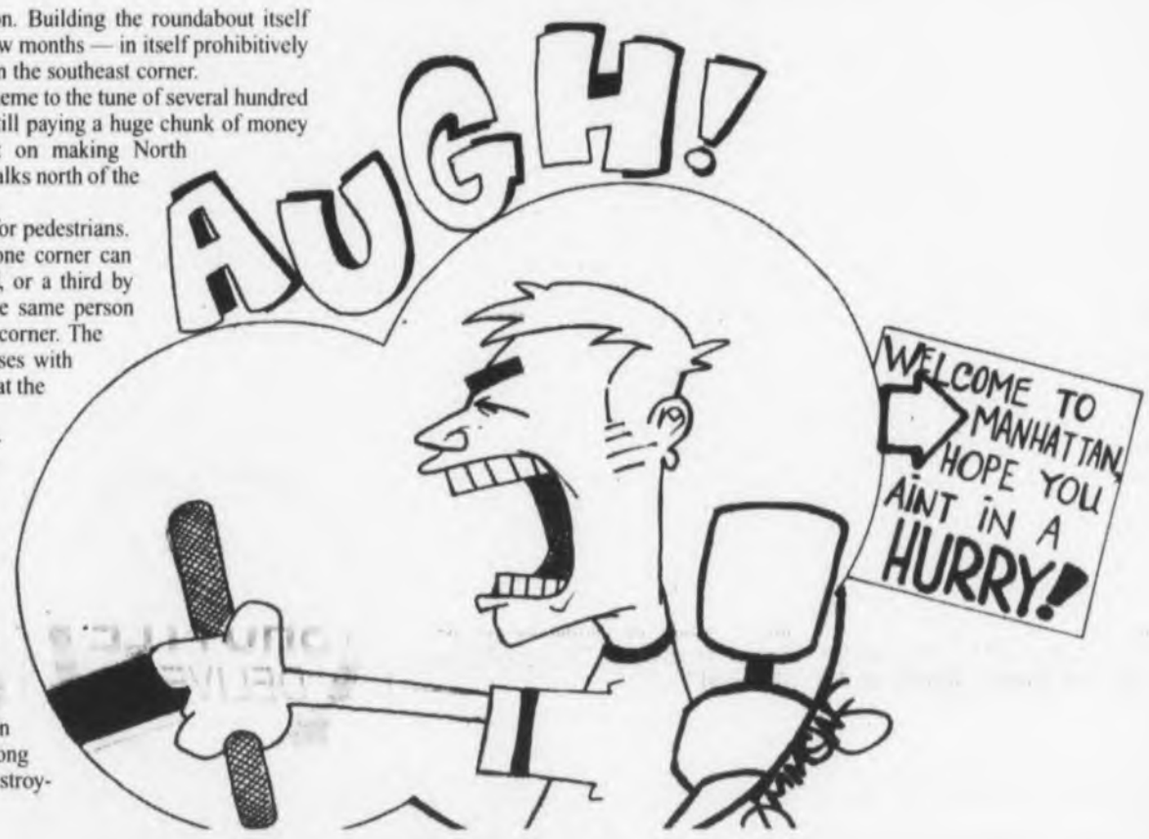
In addition to the already existing examples of bad traffic planning, ranging from the close-together and unsynchronized stoplights on Tuttle Creek Boulevard to the fanatic insistence on protected left-turn-only lanes to the proliferation of unmarked dips at nearly every large intersection in the rental neighborhood immediately east of campus, the city wants to compound its errors.

One plan under consideration calls for installing a roundabout at the intersection of Manhattan and Claflin avenues to create a claimed 400-percent reduction in conflicts. A conflict, in traffic engineering parlance — and, for that matter, in everyday English — is an opportunity for a collision between two cars. Every car that goes through this intersection undergoes a conflict that begins with the approach and ends once it passes under the hanging signal light.

The city wants to multiply the number of conflicts by replacing this intersection with a roundabout. This would force cars to come to a stop at one feed into the roundabout. Cars would then be required to turn right into the circle, yielding to traffic already in it.

This is conflict number one. Then the car would be forced to go through the roundabout and past other feeds, each a mini-intersection in its own right. This adds still more conflicts.

So the opportunities for the unwary motorist to crash and burn are multiplied by, at minimum, a factor of two.



What benefits does this arrangement offer? So far there appear to be none. It requires people to come to a full stop before entering the circle, which interrupts traffic flow and aggravates congestion. Building the roundabout itself would entail closing the intersection for a few months — in itself prohibitively inconvenient — and removing a few trees on the southeast corner.

Although the state is complicit in this scheme to the tune of several hundred thousand dollars, the city of Manhattan is still paying a huge chunk of money to do this, which could be better spent on making North Manhattan Avenue a curbed road with sidewalks north of the overflow parking lots.

This plan also creates more difficulties for pedestrians. At the moment, a walker standing at any one corner can reach two others by crossing a single road, or a third by crossing two roads. With a roundabout, the same person will have to cross two roads to reach any corner. The chances of pedestrians being injured increases with the amount of time spent on a paved surface at the same level as vehicle traffic.

Although a variety of mitigation strategies are possible, such as a fountain or small stand of trees that could be planted in the empty space at the center of the roundabout, none of these can eclipse the basic disadvantages of high cost, increased opportunity for accidents for both walkers and car drivers, disruption to surrounding structures and traffic during construction and congestion.

This traffic planning could make only Ivan the Terrible proud. No decent person would be excited by this addendum to a long history of harming or killing people and destroying cars.

Marie is real.

Very, very real.

Marie heard Harold enter the room. A wave of fear swept over her. It happened every time her parents left her with Harold and Helen. She never got used to it.

He leaned over the slender 5-year old's shivering body. He gently lifted her off the pallet of blankets on the floor. The stench of his body odor made Marie feel queasy. She could sense the fear in her younger cousins, Jimmy and Peggy.

As he lifted her nightshirt and began to touch her, Marie retreated to a place in her imagination that Harold could never find. He could molest her body, but he couldn't touch her mind.

Her parents came for her on Sunday. Marie said nothing. For seven years, this pattern was repeated.

For 27 long years, Marie said nothing.

After her mother was taken to a mental institution when Marie was 12, she became mother to her four younger sisters. Because their grandmother physically abused them, she also became their protector.

At 19, Marie finally escaped into an apparent Camelot. She married a devout Catholic. By the age of 31, Marie had two young boys, a handsome husband and an indescribable temper that she could not understand. What Harold had done was a prison from which she could not escape.

One dark evening, everything came crashing down.

She removed the gun from the drawer. She clumsily loaded the cartridges into the chamber. Her two sons, 7 and 11, appeared in the doorway.

"Momma?"

"What, honey?" Marie's voice was deathly calm.

"Whatcha' doin'?"

Marie sat down on the edge of the bed without answering. Thoughts raced maddeningly through her muddled mind. Still, the memory of Harold's terrible crime hid somewhere in the dark recesses of her consciousness. The gun lay in her lap. Her oldest son took a cautious step toward her.

"Don't."

He stopped.

She stopped.

Everything stopped.

Time stood still for what could have been seconds, or even hours. How long she sat holding the gun, her boys in front of her crying softly, no one knows.

The door burst open.

Her husband, Bill stepped into the room.

"Marie, there are some people here to see you."

She turned her head slowly.

"Oh?"

"Yes, honey, they want you to give me the gun," Bill's voice trembled as he looked at his two young sons, "Give me the gun."

Two more people — a man and a woman — slipped quietly into the room.

"Marie, we are your friends. Please put down the gun. Let's talk."

The soothing voice of the woman penetrated Marie's mind. Tentatively, the woman took the gun from Marie's trembling hand.

Marie spent the next five days in a mental hospital. She remembered nothing. Over the course of the next year, Marie began recalling — with the help of therapy — what Harold had done to her.

Remembering such atrocities drove her over the edge. She and Bill divorced later that same year. Marie's life spiraled downward. She and her second husband began to use drugs. During this time, she became associated with the notorious motorcycle gang, the Hell's Angels. She transported the chemicals used to make methamphetamines, receiving extraordinary sums of money.

Eventually, the Hell's Angels gave her an ultimatum. The marriage was taking time away from the "business" of running their drug operation. The ultimatum: divorce or be terminated — literally. Her second marriage was over.

Her spiral continued, as she sunk deeper and deeper into the drug culture. She continued to run the drug operation, and her life sank further into the mire of despair.

Eventually she left the Hell's Angels. She moved to another state and fell in love with a man named Lenny. Lenny and Marie loved each other and drugs — about equally.

One evening, they finally hit rock bottom.

During a heated argument, it became clear to Marie that Lenny was going to hit her. Memories of her past flashed before her. She grabbed a pair of scissors ...

As Marie sits before me now, she has found peace. After that awful night a few months ago, she and Lenny decided that they needed answers that neither of them had. They were on bottom — so far down that they could not even catch a glimpse of the top. The anger had failed.

The drugs had failed. All else had failed. They finally gave up. Marie sits before me as a testament to the horrors of child molestation, drugs and violence. But, above all this, what stands apart to me is what has become of Marie since that fateful night with Lenny. She was baptized Sunday. Her face glows with a radiance that does not come from this world.

Marie has become a living example of what the apostle Paul said in his second letter to the Corinthians (5:17), "Therefore, if anyone is in Christ, they are a new creation; the old has gone, the new has come."

Marie sits before me a truly new creation.

Hale Library needs should be placed before football

Editor,

When I first heard the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics was making a request for a referendum to raise our privilege fees to support funding for a stadium expansion, I was stunned. I wondered how this could even be considered, given the state of Hale Library's resources. I don't believe our university could be more interested in a larger football stadium than a resourceful library.

Then I realized it's not our entire university that had its priorities messed up. It was the athletic department exercising its strong voice. Let's exercise our powerful voices on Nov. 17 and 18 when we decide what our university's priority really is.

Connotation of nickname fitting of defense style

Editor,

In the letter to the editor regarding our Wildcat defense's nickname, "Lynch Mob," there was a misconception regarding what a lynch mob is. A lynch mob, historically and by definition, is a group of people who, without due process of law, assault and usually kill a person by beating, hanging or burning.

The fury of the lynch mob has been evident throughout European and American history, as criminals, accused witches and even political figures were attacked and killed by mobs.

In our own history, lynch mobs often took the law into their own hands to deal with accused horse thieves, murderers and child molesters.

Yes, there were many lynchings of African Americans, particularly in the South. But not all lynch mobs were groups of whites assaulting African Americans.

Though the majority of racially motivated lynchings were directed at African-Americans, many other minorities also fell victim. To say that all lynch mobs were groups of whites hunting down African-Americans is like saying that every car on the road is a Ford Taurus. Yes, there are a lot of them, but you'd be overlooking far too much with such a narrow statement.

Lynch mobs were not a positive thing. But, I do believe the nickname does fit the swarming style of our defense. If the shoe fits, wear it.

Former professor cared, showed dedication

Editor,

I am writing this letter in response to the article that ran in Tuesday's paper concerning the suit filed against the university by former assistant professor Ali Kanso El-Ghori.

First, I want to say that this man was probably one of the best teachers I have ever had in my life.

He cared beyond what was expected of him, and it showed in the commitment he felt toward his students. This professor wasn't like most others. Most professors don't take their entire class out for coffee, let alone pay for it out of their own pockets.

Most students don't throw a birthday party for their professors. Most professors don't stay around their offices until 3 a.m. Most professors don't seek you out when you are at Wal-Mart just to say hello. Those are just a few of the things that made El-Ghori different.

Unfortunately, the university that I love and support doesn't realize the importance of people like El-Ghori. There have been and there will be more teachers our university will let go because they are different.

I remember a movie in which a teacher was fired because he was different. Do you remember "Dead Poets Society"? That is exactly the way El-Ghori was. We need professors who wish to make a difference. If that means being different, then so be it.

I have one of the professors who was mentioned in the article, and I will say that he is a good professor. Maybe the reason these professors didn't like El-Ghori was because they didn't understand him and never had him in class.

To really appreciate great teachers we must first understand their angle. Please President Jon Wefald, don't let the great professors get away. They are the ones who really care.

Donor shortage leaves patients playing waiting game

LORI GUILFOYLE
staff reporter

Dylan Spencer, senior in secondary education and biology, has experienced firsthand how important organ donors can be.

In 1995, Spencer's father, Richard Spencer, was on the waiting list for a liver donation for a month before the organ became available. When a family friend was involved in a fatal accident two weeks before Christmas, the Spencers received word that the liver Richard Spencer desperately needed was being designated to him by the family.

Richard Spencer was transported from the hospital in Scott City, Kan., to Kansas City, where the transplant was performed.

He was able to return home on Christmas Eve.

"Having my father home was the best present I ever received," Dylan Spencer said.

As of this month, there are 55,530 patients on the national waiting list for an organ transplant. Every 18 minutes a new name is added to the list, according to the United Network for Organ Sharing.

UNOS is a private, nonprofit, membership corporation located in Richmond, Va. Its mission is to provide organ transplants to patients with organ failure.

UNOS members include every transplant program, organ procurement organization and tissue-typing laboratory in the United States.

Individuals on the transplant waiting list are registered with UNOS, which is available through a centralized computer network linking all organ procurement organizations and transplant centers accessible 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

When an organ becomes available anywhere in the United States, the transplant center or organization accesses the UNOS computer, which provides a list of matches with closely related characteristics.

Donors and recipients are matched by tissue, blood type, length of time on waiting list and immune status. For heart, heart-lung, liver, lung and pancreas transplants, the distance to the hospital where the organ awaits is also a consideration.

After receiving the waiting list, the transplant coordinator contacts a transplant team of surgeons and physicians for the selection of a patient. Lab tests are necessary to measure compatibility between the donor and the recipient. This ensures the recipient's immune system won't reject the organs.

Patient selected must meet several criteria.

They must be available, healthy enough to survive surgery, and willing to be transplanted immediately.

After the testing, surgery is scheduled and the transplant takes place.

Individuals might indicate their wish to be a donor by signing a Uniform Organ Donor Card, which can be requested when renewing a drivers license.

Signing such a card doesn't necessarily grant permission to donate. Hospital personnel still ask the next-of-kin for permission.

For this reason, it is vital that individuals willing to donate to inform their relatives about their decision so that it can be honored.

Information about the organ donation process was provided through the Communications Department of UNOS.

Program gives K-State money for technology

▸ STUDENT FEES INCREASE, but state will compensate as part of program.

MATT KREPS
staff writer

K-State students might see slightly higher student fees next semester, but the state will pay twice as much.

In June, the Kansas Board of Regents approved a two-to-one fee proposal. Students at all regents schools would pay $1 per credit hour. In return, the state would match the fee with $2 per hour.

The money is part of a larger technology enhancement program, sent to the governor's office and the Legislature on Sept. 15.

"Along with the library and faculty salaries, equipment is the third leg of the university's major needs," Provost James Coffman said.

The estimated $3.8 million per year will fund classroom technology enhancements. This can range from multimedia to chemistry labs, said Ray Hauke, regents director of planning and budget.

The governor is reviewing the initiative.

The regents will have an opportunity to state their support of the program in mid-November.

If Gov. Bill Graves supports the initiative, he will recommend that the Legislature approve the request next year.

The governor will formally state his views in a January address of the Legislature.

"If the governor pushes for it, then we've got a lot better chance of getting it than if the governor doesn't push for it," said Student Body President Tim Riemann.

The Student Advisory Committee to the regents, which is composed of the six student body presidents of regents schools, has endorsed the plan, Riemann said.

If the initiative passes the House of Representatives and Senate, funding will start during the fall semester.

"The state component would become available July 1, assuming they approved it," Hauke said.

The student portion would become available after fees were paid.

Hauke said the board expects the governor to support the fee program.

"He was supportive of our equipment initiative last year," Hauke said.

K-State would see more than $1.4 million for the main campus and K-State-Salina each year. The College of Veterinary Medicine would receive about $48,000.

As of last year, K-State's total equipment needs were $54 million, Coffman said.

Hauke said certain areas are targets for immediate upgrades. These include computers for student and faculty use, lab equipment for the sciences, and better audio and visual equipment for classrooms.

"It would do a lot for K-State because whatever money K-State puts into it would be earmarked for K-State," Riemann said. "It's a good thing all around."

Festival uses games, prizes in hopes of raising awareness

TONYA ALLOWAY
staff reporter

One out of nine women will be diagnosed with breast cancer, Linda Wertzberger, licensed practical nurse at the Women's Clinic, told a student at Lafene Health Center's Festival of Health in the K-State Student Union on Tuesday.

"Are you doing self examinations every month?" she asked.

Wertzberger, committee chairwoman of the festival, said it is important for students to learn about health education and about the various services Lafene has to offer.

Each department at Lafene had its own booths with prizes, games and informational handouts. There was a duck pond and Wheel of Fortune.

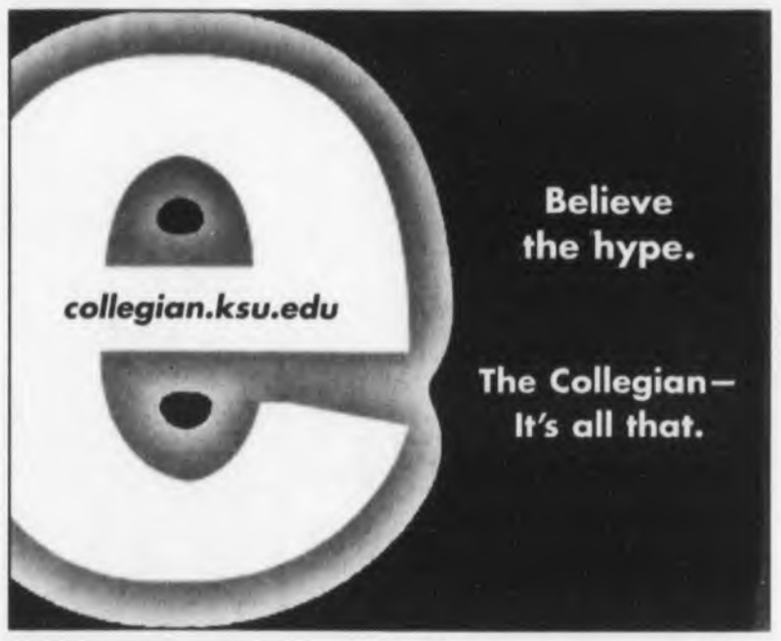
The women's clinic tested students on their knowledge of sexually transmitted diseases and gave out mugs and breast self-examination kits.

Amanda Sayler, freshman in child development and social work, said she had fun and learned a lot from the festival.

"It's interesting," Sayler said. "There's lots of prizes, lots of facts to learn about health awareness, STDs and stuff like that." She also won a compact disc from KSDB-FM 91.9 for naming a department at Lafene.

The nursing staff gave free blood pressure tests, and flu shots were offered at $6 for students and $10 for faculty and staff.

"I didn't know they gave flu shots at Lafene," Corey Dunn, freshman in dietetics, said.



Although the festival was aimed at informing the students, Wertzberger said it was important that everyone was having fun.

"It's neat to be able to have fun with the kids and to see them at a less serious level than when they come into Lafene," she said.

"We also enjoy seeing the faces that we haven't seen come through Lafene yet."

Bob Mortimer, physical therapist, said he had a lot of students sign up for a drawing for an air cast.

"It looks like everybody's having fun," he said.

Journalist ponders her post-graduation journalism career

T-minus 45 days, an iffy Spanish final and counting.

My D-Day, or actually, my G-Day, is Dec. 13. Have I started looking for a job? Not hardly. Have I opened my Spanish book this semester? Not nearly enough.

Everyone asks, "So, where are you looking for jobs?"

Well, that's easy. Anywhere that has sports and needs a sports writer or sports TV reporter to cover them.

I don't care. It could be North Dakota at this point. I hear the University of North Dakota vs. Minnesota is a hockey battle to be witnessed, so it might not be all that bad. Just cold.

Since I'm from K.C., people then ask, "Do you want to stay in Kansas City?"

Well, that's a tough one as well. If one of our esteemed media outlets came out and said it couldn't live another day without me as its Chiefs beat reporter, I would live there forever.

VIEWPOINT

SUN DEE MILLS

SUN DEE MILLS is a senior in electronic journalism. You can send your e-mail comments to Sun Dee at sundee@ksu.edu.

That is not going to happen, so I thought I'd look at the top-five places that would best serve a struggling sports journalist like myself.

1. California: What a sports mecca. Just in L.A., you've got the Dodgers, Lakers, Clippers and Kings (I'm talking hockey here). College sports abound here, too. Sports Illustrated named UCLA the best jock school in the nation, and USC usually has something to brag about. And the WNBA brought the Sparks to town last summer.

Just half an hour south (depending on the Southern California traffic) in Anaheim, you'll find Mickey Mouse, the Mighty Ducks and the Angels, courtesy of Disney CEO Michael Eisner.

Go a little further south, where the Padres and Chargers can be found, and you could pick up some bargains in San Diego's border town Tijuana as well.

If you know the way to San Jose, you can catch more hockey action with the Sharks. Follow the road further north and you'll cross Tiger Woods' old school, Stanford.

Within about a two-hour radius is another saturated sports site. In and around San Francisco, you've got the '49ers and Giants. Living in the town that boasts the Fisherman's Wharf, sourdough bread and rare snowfall would be all right with me.

Crossing that big bridge will get you to Oakland. The Athletics and Raiders are now in Oakland, at least for today. (Reporting with objectivity is so important, and since I do not care at all about the Raiders, that beat would be a breeze.) Check out Berkeley as you cruise further northeast to Sacramento. Here you'll find the WNBA's Monarchs and former Wildcat player Mitch Richmond and the Kings.

Gee, my mouth is watering. Even if I can't find a job here, I think I'll take a road trip.

2. Florida: Along the same lines as California, but within a smaller area. Starting in Tallahassee, you can visit with Coach Bobby Bowden and the Florida State Seminoles. Two hours south, you'll hit ex-Cat coach Bob Stoops' new home in Gainesville at the swamp in Florida. Orlando has the Magic (and I'm not talking Kingdom), but no Shaq.

Further south, you'll discover Tampa is coming into its own as a sports city. With the Bucs, the Lightning and the new Devil Rays, the only thing this town is missing is an NBA team. But that can be found in Miami with the Heat, as well as the Dolphins, the Panthers, Hurricanes and the world-champion Florida Marlins (it really pains me to write that).

3. Atlanta: Don't flame me — this is a personal choice. I have family there and have been watching the Braves for as long as I can remember. Objectivity would fly out the window, because I have followed the Hawks' Christian Laettner since his days as a Blue Devil and would cherish the chance to cover Lenny Wilkens' team. I even have a soft spot for the hapless Falcons. The ABL's Glory and the soon-to-be NHL Thrashers complete the professional scene. College action in the ACC and the SEC thrives with Georgia Tech downtown and the University of Georgia an hour away.

4. Chicago: The only drawback in the Windy City is the weather — I hate the cold, which is probably the biggest reason Chi Town's not No. 1. The traditions of the Bulls, the Bears, the Sox, the Cubs and the Blackhawks make up for the weather. Northwestern, Notre Dame and the Illini provide a local college fix.

5. Texas: Other than the Cowboys existing in this state (I'd be such an objective reporter for them), the Lone Star State is a perfect sports locale. There's something for everyone — three NBA teams, two baseball franchises, hockey, the WNBA, practically year-round golf, four Big 12 schools and a huge high school football tradition — equaling a plethora of opportunities.

Other towns have been excluded simply for space reasons, but would include Denver; New York; Washington, D.C. and Seattle.

An honorable mention goes to Pittsburgh: With the Steelers, the Pirates and the Penguins, you'd only have to buy one T-shirt. All three teams sport the same colors, which saves the fans money, but it isn't the smartest marketing strategy I've heard of.

So, if anyone out there hears that one of these towns is desperate for a sports reporter, drop me a line. And if you see Lenny and Christian, tell them I said hi.

BREATH OF FRESH AIR

"This is such a big university, and I cherish everything that happens to me here."

• wide receiver Gavin Peries

K-STATE WIDE RECEIVER GAVIN PERIES catches a 39-yard pass during the K-State vs. Ohio game on Sept. 13 at KSU Stadium. Peries had two catches for a total of 71 yards.

Peries finds success on field despite medical problem

After going through grueling two-a-days and months of practices, most of K-State's wide receivers are conditioned well enough to run their routes downfield and easily come back at full speed the next play.

But Gavin Peries can't do that.

Make him run 20 yards at full speed, and he's taking deep breaths. He can make it through an offensive series, but he'll definitely be tired when it's over.

But that's not because he's out of shape.

Nor does he suffer from game-day hangovers.

And he sure doesn't smoke.

Peries battles for breath every time he runs downfield because of his asthma.

However, judging by his numbers, he's winning the battle. He is K-State's leading receiver with 10 catches. He leads the team in receiving yardage and yardage per game and has the highest yardage-per-catch average of all the Wildcats' regular receivers.

Still, it hasn't always been easy. Peries transferred to K-State from Pasadena City College, Calif., which is about 30 minutes east of Los Angeles. He thought the lack of smog in Kansas would help him, but the Midwest heat brought allergies, which made his asthma worse than it was in California.

"The hardest adjustment for me was when I came here," he said. "For the first time in my life, I felt like it was gonna beat me. I never gave up before, but I know a couple of times at practice I stopped. I felt like it beat me. It was the hardest thing for me to adjust to. Now I think I have it under control. I have better medication. It's not much of a factor any more."

Peries uses his inhalers 12 times a day and isn't too worried about having an asthma attack on the football field. Trainers and coaches hold his medication for him on the sidelines in case he has a problem, but that hasn't been the case yet.

His new medications, designed to prevent asthma attacks, have worked so far. He still has a problem with shortness of breath, but he's not worried.

"Being out of breath doesn't mean you're having an asthma attack," he said. "It just means you're struggling to breathe. It doesn't require you to use your inhaler. It's just part of having asthma."

Although Peries is getting used to it, he still has to be careful.

"You're struggling to get each breath," he said. "Everyone else can run around forever and be fine, but I can run 20 yards and be out of breath. A lot of times, it depends on if it's a real hot day, I struggle more. But now that it's cooling down, it's a little easier."

This year, he's happy with the arrival of fall. But last year, when he was fresh out of Southern California, he didn't take too kindly to the drop in temperature.

A cold day in Pasadena is 60 degrees, but here he learned that ice is more than something to put in a glass of soda.

"I remember walking to class thinking I wasn't gonna make it," he said. "It was tough, but like anything, you just get used to it."

Coming to play for the Cats wasn't something Peries always thought about. Actually, it wasn't something he ever thought about. He admits that when it came time to decide what university to transfer to, he hadn't ever heard of K-State.

But his recruiting adventure was a little different than most football players who end up playing for a top-15 program.

Most players receive letters and phone calls from coaches trying to sell their programs. However, Peries tried to sell himself to more than 30 programs by sending in highlight films, newspaper clippings and by making phone calls.

He heard from a handful of schools, including K-State, Kent State, Arizona State, Oregon State and Colorado State. While they considered him, he made sure to be fair and let them know he had asthma. He said the coaches were fair and gave him a chance.

K-State coach Bill Snyder was one of those coaches, and he wasn't worried about Peries being able to play for the Cats.

"If we thought it was going to impair his ability to play here, we would have given it a second thought," Snyder said. "But that wasn't the case. Based on past experiences, our guys have handled themselves fine and been able to play."

After redshirting last year, Peries is finally getting his chance to play this year. And so far, he's made the most of his opportunities. Along with being K-State's leading receiver, he's had

Wildcats earn academic honors

The K-State cross country team placed seven members on the Big 12 Conference All-Academic Team. All seven were first-team selections.

Diederich was one of 10 student athletes nominated with a 4.0 grade point average.

Student athletes with a 3.2 GPA or better are considered first team. Anyone else above a 3.0 received honorable mention.

K-State wraps up its schedule with the Big 12 Championships on Saturday in Stillwater, Okla. The Cats will be out to improve on their 1996 finishes, when the men's team wound up sixth and the women's team placed seventh in the 12-team competition.

Football team on television

Saturday's K-State football game vs. Texas Tech will start at 11:30 a.m. and will be televised on the Big 12 syndicated package, which can be seen on WIBW-13 (TCI Ch. 3) in Manhattan. The kick-off time has changed from the original 1 p.m. time on the schedule.

The Nov. 8 home game vs. Kansas will not be televised and will start at 1:10 p.m. as scheduled. No tickets remain for either the KU game or the Nov. 15 home finale vs. Colorado.

Conference packing stadiums nationwide

After last week's mid-season report on Big 12 football home attendance totals, an Oct. 25 push of six contests has edged 1997 turnouts past the 1996 figures (including the Dr. Pepper Big 12 Championship Game).

As a whole, Big 12 teams have averaged 53,338 fans through Oct. 18 home outings, as opposed to the conference, which attracted an average 51,866 fans per game (with the title game included) for an increase of 2.8 percent overall. Six Big 12 battles drew an average of 44,621 fans last week, despite tornadoes Saturday on the Oklahoma-Texas border and approaching October snowstorms in Northern areas.

Volleyball team receives votes

Coming off its 3-0 (15-6, 15-2, 15-2) drubbing of then-No. 12 Texas A&M in Manhattan and a strong performance in a 3-0 loss against No. 9 Texas, who is 10-0 in Big 12 play, K-State received 17 votes in Tuesday's USA Today/AVCA poll. This leaves the Cats No. 29 in the nation.

Four Big 12 teams are in the poll: No. 9 Texas, No. 11 Nebraska, No. 15 Texas A&M and No. 23 Colorado.

Texas Tech and Oklahoma also received votes.

Cat volleyball to play on Halloween

The Cats will travel to Lubbock to tackle Texas Tech on Friday, marking the 11th time the Cats will play on Halloween night.

K-State is 5-5 on Halloween and has won three of the last four games played on Halloween.

The Halloween game lived up to expectations in 1987, as UMKC was forced to forfeit when bad weather prevented the team from traveling to Manhattan.

Crew's race canceled

The K-State women's rowing team got an unexpected week off when the Head of the Iowa regatta, scheduled for Oct. 25 and 26, was canceled because of bad weather. It will not be rescheduled.

The Cats return home for the traditional Class Day Regatta on Saturday at Tuttle Creek Reservoir. Members of each of the four classes will race against one another in an intrasquad competition.

White team takes series

The White Squad won the 1997 intrasquad K-State Fall World Series, five games to two. Following team tradition, the losing Purple squad will serve a meal to the victorious White team. The series concluded fall practice for the team.

Purple's Eric Sommerhauser was the top offensive performer for either side, hitting .474 with one home run and three RBIs. White's Scott Voos hit a team-best .412 while stealing four bases.

Purple's Tom Henshaw was one of the top pitchers, posting a 0.75 ERA, which was highlighted by a six-hit complete game in game six. Pat Hertzel led the White team with a 1-1 record and a 3.00 ERA.

OU and KU win memorial tournament

The Oklahoma and Kansas men's soccer teams were awarded joint first-place positions Sunday in the KSU/Ed Chartrand Memorial Soccer Tournament. The tie was a result of the three-day tournament being shortened because of heavy rains Sunday.

It was the 19th playing of the Chartrand tournament. The tournament is named after Edward E. Chartrand, a former Leawood, Kan., resident who played for the K-State soccer team. He died in May 1979 at the age of 22.

Andy Beard, a senior from Wichita who plays on the K-State team, was announced as the 1997 recipient of the Ed Chartrand Memorial Soccer Scholarship.

The $500 scholarship is presented each year to a K-State soccer player and is funded by private donations as well as donations by the Chartrand family.

The Dev Nelson Press Box.

Constructed in 1993 at a cost of $3.3 million, the building is named for longtime K-State sportscaster and supporter Dev Nelson.

But calling it a press box hardly does justice to the building, which houses 126 luxury seats and 22 luxury suites.

Though it seats 100 members of the press and houses radio and television crews, most of the press box is composed of premium seating for athletic donors.

Bob Cavello, business manager for the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, said the box is a good source of revenue for the department.

"This does help us raise money to provide athletic opportunities for student athletes," he said. "The money that comes from the box has a great deal to do with the health of our athletic programs."

The cost for an individual luxury seat when the box was built was a $500 one-time charge, plus $500 per year and the cost of regular season tickets. These seats are referred to as club seats and are in rooms on each end of the building's second level.

Now, Cavello said, those prices are under review and have yet to be determined for new seat holders. The waiting list for luxury seats numbers 41.

Luxury boxes, which house 24 fans, cost about $100,000 for a five-year contract when the boxes were built, suite owners said.

Donna Vanier, wife of Jack Vanier, the namesake of the Vanier Football Complex, said her family's luxury suite has been worth it.

"When it rains or snows it's really nice. Overall, though, it's just fun having a place to entertain," she said.

Box-holders can decorate their boxes with personal belongings and K-State memorabilia, Vanier said. Others furnish their boxes in other ways. A refrigerator, wet bar and catered food are provided.

Those with club seats said they also enjoy the atmosphere in the box on game days. Rows of 63 seats compose the club seating boxes, with catered buffets and television monitors adding to the room.

> "This is hog heaven."
> Bob Pulford, Manhattan resident and K-State alumnus

"It offers protection from the weather, the view is great and the air conditioning isn't bad either," said Bob Pulford, a Manhattan resident and K-State alumnus. "We do miss the crowd noise and excitement a little bit, but not enough to change our mind."

Pulford said he and his wife, like others in the press box, are longtime university supporters.

"We've had these seats ever since the press box opened," Pulford said. "We're both graduates of Kansas State, and we've been watching K-State football since the early 1950s. This is hog heaven."

For many with club seats, the draw to the press box is its comfortable seating and luxury atmosphere. For those with luxury boxes, however, business is also a large part of game-day activities.

Brent Rockers, a representative for Novartis Crop Protection in Lincoln, Neb., said his company uses its luxury box to entertain Kansas customers.

"This has been good for us," Rockers said. "It allows you to bring some of your key customers up and be able to entertain them and get to know them better."

Business discussion doesn't end with corporations. University business is also a hot topic in the boxes, especially the President's Suite. The suite, which is larger than normal luxury boxes, has been host to numerous distinguished guests as well as the family of President Jon Wefald on game day.

Wefald said the press box is a good public relations tool for the university.

"It's just a great facilitator for meeting

Defense attorney confident in British au pair murder trial

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. — A confident defense attorney told jurors Tuesday that prosecutors did not even remotely prove that a British au pair fatally shook or slammed the head of an 8-month-old infant in her care.

In closing arguments at Louise Woodward's murder trial, prosecutor Gerard Leone Jr. characterized the defense as a theatric production, Woodward as an actress and some of the defense expert witnesses as intellectually arrogant.

Woodward, 19, is charged with killing Matthew Eappen, out of frustration over the child's fussing and the demands of her job.

But her attorney, Barry Scheck said, "Did that happen? Have they proven that to you beyond a reasonable doubt? It's not even close."

Leone told jurors the baby's injuries could have been caused by no one other than the teen-age au pair.

"Make no mistake about it," he told the jury, "this is a case of child abuse."

It was not just coincidence. The baby fell into a coma on a day Woodward told police she was rough with the infant, he said.

Earlier, Scheck blasted Dr. Eli Newberger, head of the child protection unit at Children's Hospital in Boston, for making a snap judgment that the baby was abused.

Newberger and other doctors at the hospital abandoned careful, critical, objective and scientific scrutiny of the facts, Scheck said.

Scheck focused on the medical evidence he said was the basis of his client's defense, contending the baby's brain did not show signs of a sudden traumatic brain injury on Feb. 4, the day he was rushed to the emergency room. The injury was as much as 3 weeks old, Scheck said, citing expert witnesses called by the defense.

Leone said the prosecution witnesses were doctors who regularly worked with children, while the defense experts did not have day-to-day, hands-on experience.

Scheck, who handled the medical side of the O.J. Simpson defense, shook the lectern and used his hands to simulate the shaking and slamming prosecutors said happened when Woodward was left alone with the child.

"We may never know the full answer to exactly how this incident occurred. But the issue in this case, and the only issue in this case, is Feb. 4," Scheck said. "We have proven to you overwhelmingly that it was an old injury."

Co-defense counsel Andrew Good called Woodward a child lover who had the misfortune of being with Matthew the day the baby was re-injured.

"She's going to go home. She's going to go back to school. And if you do your job, someday she'll get married and she'll be somebody's mother. And she'll be a wonderful mother," he said.

Superior Court Judge Hiller Zobel's ruling means jurors would have to acquit Woodward if they believe she is guilty only of manslaughter, defined as a reckless action that shows disregard for human life.

A guilty verdict on the most serious charge would mean she would spend the rest of her life in an American prison; she would become eligible for parole in 15 years if convicted of second-degree murder.

Woodward spent two days on the stand denying charges she ever shook or hit Matthew. She calmly defended herself Monday as Leone questioned her about late hours and other behavior that prompted the Eappens to give her an ultimatum to shape up.

Leone's cross-examination revealed a young woman who chatted on the phone, went out with her friends and lied about her age to get into bars.

The trial has brought criticism of the Eappens, who are both doctors.

Callers to Boston radio talk shows accused them of putting their careers ahead of their children by hiring inexpensive child care.

Kansans gets 2nd look at historical treasures

ASSOCIATED PRESS

OVERLAND PARK, Kan. — For the second time in two years, Russia plans to show its historical treasures in Kansas.

Russian officials announced Overland Park will be a site for the "Great Emperors: Alexander I and Napoleon I" exhibition, a collection of 19th-century artifacts that organizers say have never been seen outside Russia.

"We're looking at two of the greatest emperors ever, their lives and how they affected Europe," said Betty Simecka, president of Pinnacle Productions, which will produce and market the exhibition.

Irina Rodimtseva, director of State Kremlin Museums, and Vadim Egorov, deputy general director of the State Historical Museum for Scientific Work in Russia, announced the site selection Monday.

A final deal, however, has not been completed. Organizers are expected to go to Moscow next month to work out the agreement.

A date for the exhibit has not been set, but organizers hope to put the artifacts on display next fall. The location has not been decided.

The display proposed for Overland Park is similar to the "Treasures of the Czars" exhibit in Topeka two years ago. That showing drew a half-million visitors in five months and was worth an estimated $31 million to the local economy.

The Overland Park display, which organizers hope will attract as many as 1 million people, is expected to have five times as many artifacts and will emphasize the period's military history.

For example, Simecka said organizers were trying to bring Napoleon's sleigh and field kitchen to Overland Park. They are among the many artifacts Napoleon left behind as his troops retreated from Russia.

Key issues to be resolved at next month's meeting include a site for the exhibition and the length of its stay and costs. Organizers hope to keep the exhibition in Overland Park for six or seven months, Simecka said.

It cost an estimated $5 million to $6 million to organize "Treasures of the Czars" in Topeka, Petersen said.

It's unclear whether the exhibit will tour other cities.

Rodimtseva said she was optimistic a deal would be worked out.

"We came here to start the negotiations, but because both parties treated each other very well and have a well-disposed attitude toward each other, I think this exhibit will take place," she said.

Former K-State student designs signs for Aggieville merchants

Lucky's Brewgrille, Gamer signs created by Goodman, graphic designer for hire

Lesley Baker • staff reporter

FAVORITE PHOTOG/Collegian

CRAIG GOODMAN is a graphic designer at JS Sign and Design. The new sign at Lucky's BrewGrille is one of Goodman's creations.

Graphic designers are virtual plumbers.

At least they are in the opinion of Craig Goodman, a graphic designer at JS Sign and Design in Manhattan.

He's responsible for much of the art around Aggieville, such as the back Luckys BrewGrille sign, the Oktoberfest posters, the new Gamer sign and the Powercat football posters.

"Doing the K-State stuff has been the most rewarding," Goodman said. "Driving into Kansas City, passing a billboard and seeing your logo 20-feet-high- now that's rewarding."

Goodman has been a graphic designer for three years, but he's never been really trained for the job. He attended K-State in 1988 as a drawing major and became interested in computer art. He left and came back in 1992 as a sculpting major. During this time Robert Hower, professor of art, signed him on for the Masters/Apprentice Grant. Goodman credits Hower for his success.

"I would not be anywhere in the world without him," Goodman said.

After leaving K-State a second time, he worked at odd jobs and ended up part time at JS Sign and Design. He also works full time at Ballard's and does freelancing on the side. All this skipping around has helped him in his chosen profession.

"How many graphic designers have a background in computer programming?" Goodman said of his training.

Graphic designers are people who give the rest of the world an impression about their employers, which the employers want the world to have. Goodman said a graphic designer has to be well versed in diplomacy to steer clients away from particularly hideous designs that they've fallen in love with.

Goodman also said that as a graphic designer, he makes an excellent spy. He said in his profession he has to know what sort of businesses are moving to the area and what they like. Often, companies come to him with top-secret deals such as logo changes and ask for complete secrecy.

"I do things whenever people want me to," Goodman said. "It's not very predictable, but your hours are never very long."

For prospective graphic designers Goodman said the field is relatively easy to get into, but strong public-relations skills are essential.

Goodman also pointed out that graphic designers are a tight-knit group.

"Graphic designers stick together," Goodman said.

He doesn't recommend his own winding route, though.

"Take small business classes," Goodman said. "Nearly every graphic designer does freelance and every graphic designer runs their own small business in a way. How much do you charge for an hour? How much do you charge for a print? I recommend that for any artist."

Right now is the best time to be a graphic designer, Goodman said, because the Internet allows him to do work for the East and West coasts.

As a graphic designer, though, what do people think of Goodman's creative tastes?

Steve Elder, owner of the Gamer, is satisfied with his sign.

"It's brought in a lot of customers," Elder said. "It's bright, and I like how he set it up."

The Powercat logo has also met approval.

"I think it's a more modern logo than Willie," said Melody Ortloff, freshman in English and secondary education. "It gives a more '90s look to the posters. It's a more streamlined look."

Giveaway celebrates Halloween

LINDSEY FORTMEYER
staff writer

Trick or treat?

For the Union Program Council there are no tricks involved, just treats. The UPC Promotions Committee is giving K-State students a chance to celebrate Halloween two days early with a Halloween Giveaway.

"People can stop in, or come by and pick something up," Mike Hodgson, senior in English and president of UPC, said. "We'll make it a surprise."

Hodgson said the Promotions Committee decides several events throughout the year, but the Halloween Giveaway is an additional event.

"We've done it in the past, giveaways from time to time, to celebrate holidays and special occasions," Hodgson said.

The money used to present this event is from K-Sate Student Union money, student fees, generated revenue, and institutional support.

"The Halloween Giveaway is an activity that draws itself to people," Hodgson said. "Anytime we give away free stuff, people will naturally be interested."

From 9:30 a.m. to 2 p.m. today, students are welcome to pick up Halloween treats at the Union, compliments of the UPC.

"The giveaway should lend a lot of participants, especially in celebrating Halloween," Hodgson said.

The ghoulish festivity is inside the north entrance by the information counter. Students are encouraged to pick up surprise treats earlier in the day, while supplies last.

Wichita group vents fierce rage

PHIL KELLUM
staff writer

Vent
"Long Lost Human" EP
(Hydra Head Records)

Evil, brutal, mean hardcore is the name of the game here.

Wichita's Vent is obviously influenced by the stable of bands on Victory Records, most notably Integrity, Strife and Snapcase.

"Reunion" occupies the A side and is one fierce, raging song.

I really liked the arrangement of the song. Most hardcore nowadays is pretty generic, using the same vocal stylings and chord progressions as every other hardcore band.

Vent, on the other hand, changes it up and uses harmonics on the guitars at times. Vent also uses a lot of noise and feedback, which add greatly to the song.

The title of the EP comes from a lyric from "Reunion," when the singer screams, "I've seen it, long lost human. I've seen it, I am one."

The B side is another chunk of brutality in the form of a track called "Box In The Commodore."

It's a more mid-paced tune than the A side. It also sounds thicker and heavier, if that's possible.

I also liked the contrasting dual vocals, with one screaming high-pitched and the other growling.

It's got a nice touch of evil to it.

"Box In The Commodore" ends too quickly.

Overall, this is one beast of a single that commands listening. Fans of the aforementioned Victory bands should seek this out.

Sarge
"Stall" b/w "Time After Time"
(Mud/Parasol Records)

I could tell just from looking at the cover Sarge was going to be an indie rock/emo band.

I was right.

Sarge is from Urbana, Ill., and plays jangly indie rock with a definite poppy sound, yet it isn't afraid to kick up the distortion and get all emotional a la Sunny Day Real Estate or Fugazi on you.

The A side, "Stall," is a nice, melodic pop song that would fit perfectly on a label like Merge or K Records.

The vocals of Elizabeth Elmore fit in with the song perfectly.

The band is tight musically, as it goes from pure pop to heavier, louder, emotional parts in a heartbeat.

The B side has the potential to either be really terrible or really great, because it's a cover of the Cyndi Lauper hit, "Time After Time."

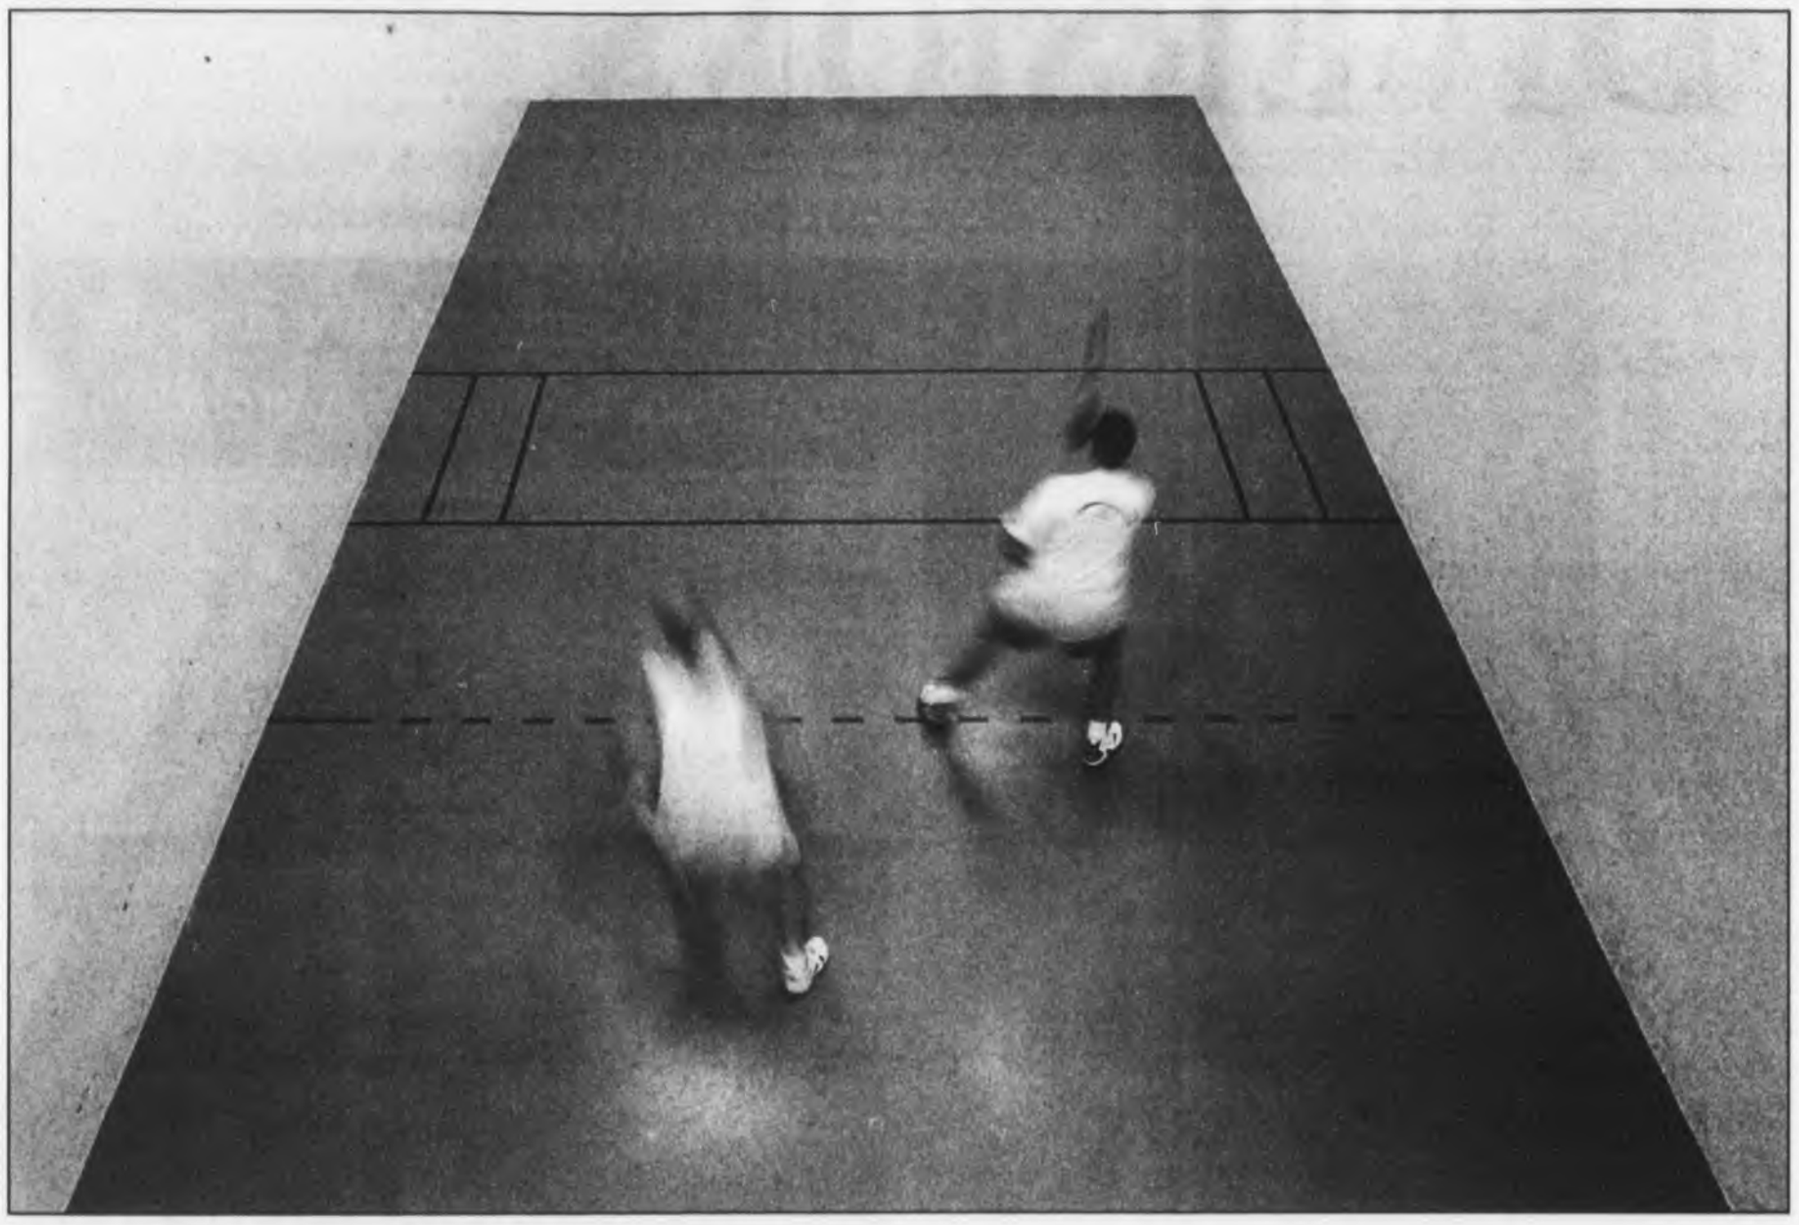
I'm glad it's the latter of the two.

When bands perform cover songs, they need to inject their own sound and their own flavor into them. Sarge does that perfectly.

Elmore takes control of the keyboards for the intro and bridge of the song.

This track is a lot louder and more emo than "Stall" is.

I loved the choruses especially with their lurching, heavy guitars and driving drum beats.



This single makes me want to hear more of Sarge. The band's label says it would appeal to fans of Talulah Gosh. Looks like I need to find stuff by them, too. You should do the same.

with regents, congressmen, the governor and others in a unique situation where it's possible to have fun and do business at the same time," he said.

Recent guests in the suite have included U.S. Senators Pat Roberts and Sam Brownback, Gov. Bill Graves, former K-State quarterback Lynn Dickey and others, Wefald said. Football games with many of those individuals have helped advance university issues, he said.

"It has been very beneficial for Kansas State ... for making progress on some important issues," Wefald said.

The new press box has also contributed to the turnaround in K-State football in recent years.

"The way it used to be, nobody came to our games. It was a struggle to keep the fans interested. They could come 10 minutes before the game and still get preferred seating," Wefald said.

Now, with a stronger program and better facilities, the mood has changed, he said.

"Now we have an atmosphere that's almost larger than the football game itself," Wefald said.

"People are actually taking the whole day to spend getting ready for the game, watching the game and after the game. It has almost become an event that transcends the game itself, and the press box is part of that."

Houston man executed for 1983 slayings

ASSOCIATED PRESS

HUNTSVILLE, Texas — A man was executed by injection Tuesday for participating in a 1983 stabbing frenzy at an amusement center that left four men dead in one of Houston's worst murder rampages.

In his last statement, Kenneth Ray Ransom insisted he was innocent and said his death would be "an instrument to abolishing the death penalty."

He apologized to the victims' families not because he felt guilty, but "because of the pain all of them are going through each holiday, each birthday that they're without their loved ones."

Ransom, 34, was condemned for fatally stabbing one of the four employees at the Malibu Grand Prix, a video arcade and go-cart track in southwest Houston.

> That's the whole idea of the thing, to execute those who are guilty.
> • Donnie Trent
> mother of man who was slain

An accomplice, Richard Wilkerson, 29, was executed four years ago and a third participant, James Randle, who was 16 at the time of the July 1, 1983, killings, is serving a life sentence.

On that night, the three went to the amusement center, ostensibly so Wilkerson could pick up his final paycheck. He had been fired two weeks earlier.

Testimony at their trials indicated the three were armed with butcher knives, stole about $1,300 and repeatedly stabbed the night manager and three employees. One victim was stabbed 22 times.

Ransom, who had served previous prison terms for burglary and auto theft, insisted he did not kill any one but said he held down one of the victims because he was forced to do so by Wilkerson.

Ransom became the 32nd Texas death row inmate to be executed this year, adding to what already is a record year for executions in the state. At least seven more inmates have execution dates scheduled for this year.

"That's the whole idea of the thing, to execute those who are guilty," said Donnie Trent, whose 22-year-old son, Roddy Harris, was among the four killed.

Trent said she would have liked to talk with Ransom to ask her which of the three killed her son.

"It's just something a mother wants to know," she said.

rier retaining wall will also be placed around the property to bounce sound away from the church.

The congestion of Anderson Avenue at Denison Avenue and 17th Street also causes problems for students from greek houses along Laramie Street and Sunset Avenue who walk to class every day.

Kelly Delker, senior in finance and president of Alpha Delta Pi, said the 80 members of her house have adopted patterns to deal with the amount of traffic on Anderson.

"It's bad. Sometimes you have to be patient," Delker said. "We pretty much walk together down Laramie and cross at 17th."

Delker said certain times of the day are worse than others.

"At 3 and 5 it's already like New York City down there, and you want to avoid crossing Anderson then," she said.

Carrie Chilen, sophomore in secondary education and member of Delta Delta Delta, said she has a 10-minute walk to campus each morning.

Longer crosswalk signals or working with the patterns of traffic would improve the situation for walkers, she said.

"I think widening it would be a good idea. I am usually in my car more than I am walking on Anderson," Chilen said. "It can be so frustrating."

Kye Hittle, senior in electrical engineering and president of Beta Theta Pi, said members of his house have changed their driving habits to accommodate the amount of traffic on Sunset and Anderson avenues.

"We try to avoid driving it like the plague. If we're going to Aggieville, we try to use Laramie and if we're going north toward campus we try to cross Anderson rather than turn onto it," he said. "I'd like to see something done, but I don't know if it's necessarily the best for pedestrians."

Adding stoplights that analyze and help the traffic flow at the intersections of Denison and Sunset could help pedestrian and auto traffic, he said.

"The stop lights are bad," Hittle said. "You almost always get stopped if you're in the center lane and if you're behind someone who wants to turn left, you have to wait through a couple light cycles."

Hittle said traffic on the side streets to the south of Anderson is just as dangerous because of parked cars and drivers using them to avoid the congestion.

Crossing the street is safe when students wait for the lights, Hittle said, and crossing might become a problem with wider roads.

"I've heard of people nearly getting hit with cars running a red light or going through a yellow late," Hittle said. "The thing I worry about is when you're late and trying to make it across Anderson at the end of the signal. That can be dangerous."

Proposal

Richard Mertz, a supporter of the citizens' group and 10-year Anderson Avenue-area resident, agreed more precautions should be made for pedestrians.

"Anderson is dangerous to walk down now," Mertz said. "It's only going to get worse."

The city has made efforts to provide for pedestrian safety, Muir said. He said sidewalks will be widened for pedestrians and bicyclists, and that traffic crossing signals will be computerized, resulting in safer crossing conditions.

"First you have traffic flow. Then you have pedestrian flow," Muir said.

The steering committee also discussed alternatives to street-level crosswalks, such as fly-over walkways and underground tunnels, but members determined that it was not feasible, Muir said. The amount of utilities in the area would have made it difficult to increase the grade of the street for pedestrian tunnels.

"You can't fit them given the circumstances," Muir said.

Messer agreed tunnels were not feasible. He said the number of homes and the commercial value of the property on the south side of Anderson Avenue would have increased the difficulty of the process.

MacFarland said the tunnel would be possible south of Nichols Hall if the original grade of the street were built up.

"If you restore that grade, you could easily put a tunnel under Anderson at that point," MacFarland said. "And the reason to do a tunnel rather than a bridge is because it's a very slight difference so far as the grade level is concerned for the people on bike, on foot and on Rollerblade."

MacFarland said street-level crosswalks are not in the best interest of pedestrians, nor do they protect pedestrians. He said pedestrians would not wait until crossing lights change.

"The pedestrians and the bicyclists and the Rollerblade people are going to be stuck at the intersection for longer periods of time," he said. "The temptation to bolt across the street and not wait for the next time when the thing finally turns the walk light on is going to be too great."

Mertz said the expansion will not only pose dangers for pedestrians, but it also will have a detrimental effect on the aesthetic quality of the Anderson Avenue corridor.

"I think it takes a tremendous justification to cut down a mature tree, and I don't see the justification," Mertz said.

MacFarland agreed that the removal of the 180 trees will diminish the area's beauty.

"When we are tearing down the urban forest that we happen to have in this area and planting what somebody else thinks are preferable species and more of them, but we know they have to be tiny," MacFarland said. "You can't put huge trees on a flatbed truck and stick them back in the ground. It's not going to happen."

Although 180 trees will be removed, the city plans to replant 240, Messer said. A community garden will also be created on the corners of Sunset and Anderson avenues, he said.

The proposal will not only add community gardens and new trees but also significant landscaping along the expansion, Messer said.

"We're taking great pain in this project to ensure that we landscape this corridor. The last thing we want to do is create a scar that will never grow back," Messer said.

Muir said the only significant changes have been the length of a right-turn lane for northbound traffic from Anderson to Denison avenues. He said public comment has been sought throughout the process.

"I think they've done a good job trying to involve everyone that is going to be affected by this," he said.

However, Mertz said the project has grown in dimension and the proposal was unclear.

"I believe there's been a lot of information, but it seems to have progressed," Mertz said.

MacFarland agreed the scope of the project has increased since its inception. He said the effects of the project were unclear at the beginning of the process.

"A lot of us were lulled into thinking that this was no big deal, that we were going to get a little widening, we were going to get left-turn arrows," he said. "And we were believing the city when they said that we're going to preserve neighborhoods. We're going to have as little impact as we possibly can on trees. And then it turns out those were outright lies."

won an NSF combined research and curriculum development grant of $428,544 with a sub-grant of $169,605 to K-State.

"The money was used for computers, summer salaries and to support graduate students who helped with the project," he said.

The project started in 1995, taking the first year to work on the course and putting it into action. The courses were to be taught for two years, ending in summer 1998.

The funding will end soon and Pahwa would like to work out something with other universities for this course to continue being taught.

"No one else in the U.S. teaches a class of this type," he said. "It would be nice to write a book and make it available to other people."

Although a formal decision has not been made, Pahwa said the group would like to write a textbook for the course.

The class is taught in the fall semester in Rathbone Hall. Pahwa said it was the only classroom available with both telephone and Internet hook-ups. By using two adjoining labs, he is able to hookup the necessary mobile equipment but must take it down after each class period.

"It is a very time consuming process," Pahwa said. "I hope in the future there will be more facilities available for this kind of equipment."

Salaries

"We established that as a practice in the late '80s because we wanted to set in motion a plan that would allow faculty a higher salary increase," Coffman said.

However, a higher-percentage salary increase is irrelevant when the average salary for faculty is as low as it is, Legg said.

"Compared to our peer institutions, our average salary is over 10 percent lower," Legg said. "It's worse if we compare to all land-grant universities or state universities."

Salary increases haven't kept up with the average Kansas income in the past two decades, he said. Even with a 2.5-percent or 3.5-percent annual merit raise, the faculty will fall further behind.

Ottenheimer said he agreed.

"If I remember correctly, my equivalent salary is less than it was 25 years ago," he said.

Generally, many faculty members aren't pleased when they compare their salary increases with other universities, he said.

"I think they're unhappy that they're on the lower end of pay compared to peer institutions," Ottenheimer said.

One way to alleviate the problem, he said, would be to revamp faculty benefits.

"I think we could use a better fringe-benefit program," Ottenheimer said. "Kmart employees don't have to pay for their parking."

For any kind of significant change in faculty salaries, Coffman said, the Kansas Board of Regents would have to maximize the money appropriated from the legislation.

"We know that faculty salaries are not competitive," he said.

helped spark a reversal in the broader market, especially for bellwether issues.

Before the IBM announcement around 10:30 a.m., stocks had plunged after the fourth-straight day of turmoil in Asian and European financial markets. The Dow was down more than 100 points, falling below 7,000 for the first time since May, and the Nasdaq composite index was down 4-percent.

"There were a lot of emotions running this market," said Barry Berman, head trader for Robert W. Baird & Co. in Milwaukee. "IBM stepped in at the right time that it managed to trigger a turnaround."

In addition, stocks got a lift from a private report pointing to a cooling off of inflationary pressures. The Conference Board said consumer confidence in the economy fell sharply in October.

U.S. Treasury bonds fell Tuesday, erasing gains from Monday when investors bought the highly liquid and secure investments as a haven for cash while they waited out the turbulence in stock markets. The decline in bond prices pushed the yield on the 30-year Treasury — a key influence on borrowing costs — to 6.28 percent from 6.12 percent late Monday.

Advancing issues outnumbered decliners by 11 to 8 on the New York Stock Exchange, where volume totaled 1.196 billion shares, topping the 684.59 million-share record set Jan. 23. In a revision, Monday's volume, originally reported as a record, was adjusted slightly downward to 684.57 million.

In other strong showings, the Standard & Poor's 500-stock list rose 44.26 to 921.25, the NYSE composite index rose 19.45 at 482.66 and the American Stock Exchange composite index rose 9.86 to 670.27.

The Nasdaq composite index rose 65.25 to 1,600.34, boosted by a strong rally in technology stocks, including Intel, Dell Computer and Microsoft.

Beside IBM's upward charge, other stocks fueling the Dow's rise included J.P. Morgan, up $6.25 to $144.25, Travelers, up $4.81 to $69.81, and Boeing, up $5 to $48.

Only four of the 30 Dow components closed down Tuesday. On Monday, all 30 of the Dow stocks fell.

"It's natural to get nervous," Lewis said. "Even I get a little excited about this, too."

Most Kansas businesses, including aircraft manufacturers didn't seem nervous about the market's jumps.

"We have not detected a dampening in the market enthusiasm for our new aircraft," said Jim Gregory, a spokesman for Raytheon Aircraft Co., which is based in Wichita.

Orders for planes are usually long-term decisions not affected by day-to-day swings in the stock market, said Jan McIntire, a spokeswoman for Cessna. No one was canceling orders for planes, she said.

The agriculture industry is driven largely by supply and demand. The stock market's plunge on Monday wasn't enough to immediately affect food sales, said William Tierney, professor of agricultural economics at K-State University. If the market's drop turns out to be the first sign of a strong recession, then consumers could begin eating out less and buying cheaper food, like chicken instead of steak, Tierney said.

Farmers worry more about a late freeze or the price of fertilizer, said Carlene Hill, director of the Center for Economic Development at Wichita State University.

If the drop in Hong Kong and other Asian markets is a signal of a recession overseas, then U.S. exports of oil seed products, feed grains, soybeans and wheat also could drop with demand. On Tuesday, Hong Kong posted its largest selloff since 1989.

"That is such a long, drawn out string of conclusions," Tierney said. "It is way too early to conclude any of that."

his share of big catches.

Last week at Oklahoma, he had two clutch catches, one for 35 yards and one for a gain of 40. He also had one of K-State's most memorable catches when the Cats played Ohio on Sept. 13.

> wide receiver

During that play, quarterback Michael Bishop was flushed from the pocket, rolled to the right sideline then back to the left, avoiding three sacks in the process. He finally threw the ball about 60 yards downfield while being hit, where wide receiver Everett Burnett deflected the pass and Peries caught it while falling face-first at Ohio's 3-yard line.

The play was one of many this season in which Peries had to adjust to Bishop's scrambling abilities, only to fight for breath once the whistle blew. But he said it's not a problem.

"We know we have to be prepared for anything," Peries said of Bishop. "You never know what he can do. He's capable of doing amazing things."

Not that Peries' catch wasn't amazing.. If he didn't come down with the ball, that play would have been just another incomplete downfield pass.

Plays like that get Peries' attention — attention he loves, considering he's playing for the No. 12 team in the country.

"This is such a big university, and I cherish everything that happens to me here," he said. "So I try and keep a little scrapbook."

Extra polling sites make spring elections technically invalid

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
staff writer

A seven-year-old piece of legislation has come back to haunt members of K-State's Student Governing Association.

Bill 1990/37 established polling places for SGA elections. According to the bill, "The 1991, and thereafter, SGA Elections (shall) be held in the K-State Union and at the Veterinary Medicine Complex."

For at least the past two years, though, polling places have included buildings that house individual academic colleges and, for at least one year, residence hall dining centers.

Those elections were technically invalid.

Governmental Relations Chair Patrick Carney, who brought the error to the attention of Student Senate at last Thursday's meeting, said the addition of other, illegal polling places was a mistake made when new regulations were written.

"The habit has never been to go into past years' legislation and see what's been done," Carney said.

This year, however, Student Senate codified more than 20 years of legislation, combining it into one reference source that can be consulted. Legislation wasn't codified, though, for past years' elections.

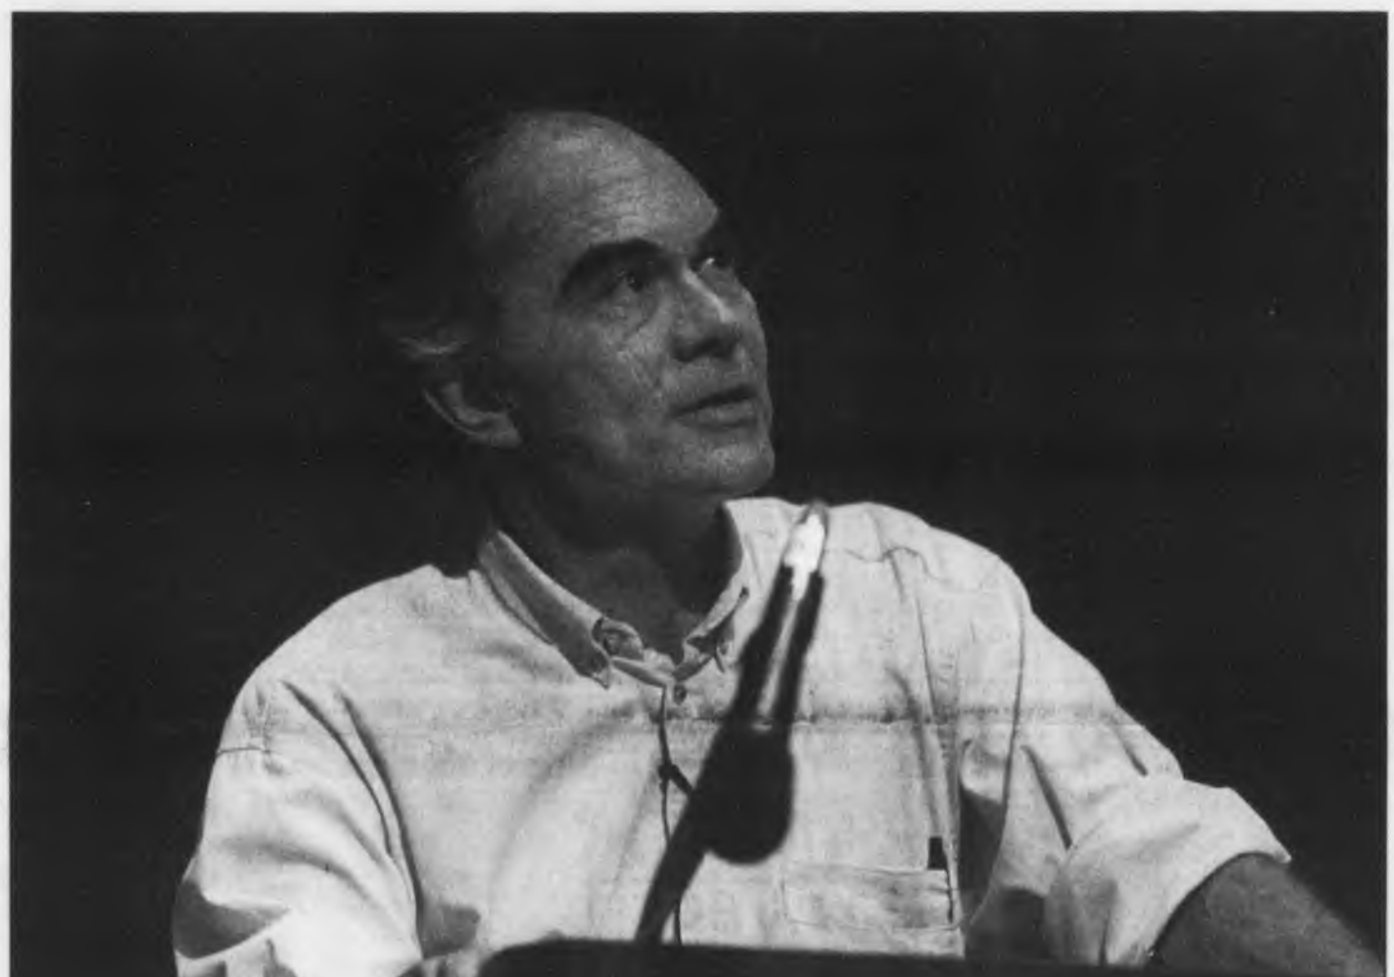
Carney said the 1990 bill could have been repealed in two ways, but neither was done.

"The only way to change the polling places after bill 90/37 was to specifically write a bill that repealed 90/37, or to make reference to additional polling places within new election regulations," Carney said. "But no other regulations with references to polling places have been passed since then."

Appeals of election results may be filed within eight days following SGA elections, Carney said. No grievances were filed with regard to polling places, which limits what can be done about the mistake.

"It's a huge glaring error. But is there anything we can do about it? Probably not," he said.

Many within SGA, including Faculty Representative to Senate Bill Muir, said they don't feel any action should be taken. The error, Muir said, was a technical one.



"We might have something that a governing group passed in 1914 that we're in violation of. It really gets into the ridiculousness of the whole thing," he said.

"A bill was passed seven years ago for polling places and then got lost in the stacks of legislation that we have," Muir said. "And then seven years later, it pops its head up and says, 'Hello! How about this bill?' Whether that could invalidate a whole system of elections is ridiculous to consider."

Agriculture Senator Bret Glendening agreed, saying the addition of polling places didn't affect the outcome of the elections and shouldn't be contested. He said the addition of new polling places was put forward with good intentions.

"It's a technicality. There are a lot of the accusations against Student Senate as being elitist and that we don't try to do anything to get student involvement," Glendening said. "It wasn't an intentional oversight of past leg-

Architect favors purpose in design

The past two decades of mainstream architecture have given the public a view of architects as magazine celebrities, eccentrics who spew forth ironic witticisms and propose building schemes that take conventional form and turn it upside down.

> The absence I find here is that architecture can make a difference in people's lives.
> • Jo Noero
> architect and professor at Washington University

At least this is the picture that architect Jo Noero, a professor at Washington University in St. Louis, painted to an audience of architects and students at a lecture Wednesday night in Forum Hall.

Noero, a native of South Africa, said his country practices architecture with an intensity that has been lost in the rest of the world and replaced with cynicism in the United States.

"The absence I find here is that architecture can make a difference in people's lives," Noero said. "It's not about being a big deal, which is really a myth of the modern movement."

Over 1 1/2 hours, Noero none-too-subtly railed against such establishment architects and theoreticians as Philip Johnson, Henry-Russell Hitchcock and Peter Eisenman as having ruined architecture. Noero said a modest agenda of enriching people's lives in a functional, purposeful manner is no longer taught in U.S. and western European schools.

Architecture, Noero said, "is an art borne out of use. Its function is to serve a purpose."

To enforce his own principles, Noero introduced a handful of his executed designs in a slide presentation.

Consultants named for alumni center

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

The architect and engineering consultants for the planned alumni center south of Memorial Stadium were announced Wednesday.

Gossen Livingston Associates Inc. and Professional Engineering Consultants, P.A., both of Wichita, were selected as the design firms for the project. The firms, who worked as a team for the proposal, were selected after an extensive search and interview process. The local project architect will be Bruce McMillan Architects.

Bob Livingston, who was in Manhattan on Wednesday to view the results of the Bayer Stone Student Design Competition, said the project gives him the opportunity to give back to his alma mater. Livingston, who will operate as principal architect on the center, graduated from K-State in 1965.

"I think this is an opportunity to do something we really don't get to do often," Livingston said. "Give back to the university that has treated us so well."

This year's design competition was an opportunity for fifth-year architecture students to design a proposal for the alumni center that incorporated stone into the project.

Livingston said viewing the student projects allowed him to see small ideas and components that could trigger further investigation when his firm begins the design process.

The alumni center is planned to be a two-to three-story, 45,000-square foot facility costing about $6 million. It will be built on the extreme southwest corner of campus at the corner of Anderson and Denison avenues. The project has moved forward since members of the KSU Alumni Association board of directors unanimously approved it in late September.

Amy Button Renz, president of the Alumni Association, said the architects hope to have schematic drawings by this spring. She said fund raising for the project should begin after Jan. 1.

Renz said the next stage for the Alumni Association is to work closely with the design companies in the design process.

"They will meet with our volunteers, staff, university officials and students to discuss the project," Renz said.

Vitale to commentate Fright Night II, kick off K-State basketball seasons

LINDSEY FORTMEYER
staff writer

The entire concourse in Bramlage Coliseum will be filled with ghosts and ghouls as Fright Night II opens its doors to students and the community. Booths will provide entertainment tonight as K-State showcases the basketball program.

Vitale

Fright Night II is a variation of Midnight Madness, a kick-off preview for the men's and women's basketball teams. The NCAA dictates the official day, allowing the teams to begin practicing.

This year, Fright Night features ESPN commentator Dick Vitale.

"Dick Vitale is phenomenal. He's a great ambassador for the sport of basketball," Cindy Fox, assistant athletic director at K-State, said.

In conjunction with Fright Night will be the first fall all-greek philanthropy.

Thirty-five greek houses have signed up to participate in booths for the event, as well as four residence halls and other businesses. The booths will include activities such as games, mask making, apple-bobbing and pumpkin coloring.

"The evening should put on a great show for the community and student body," Fox said. "Everything is free, and the first thousand people receive a free T-shirt."

The men's and women's basketball teams will act in skits and scrimmage. Willie the Wildcat will open the evening with a special performance.

"Order of Omega will also have a food drive on the east and west sides of Bramlage," Fox said. "We had our best food drive ever last year.".

Merchandise from Dick Vitale can be purchased on the concourse. People will receive a free 1997-98 College Basketball Preview magazine with any purchase.

Although Fright Night does not begin until 8 p.m., the doors will open at 6:30 p.m. for children and community members to visit the booths around the concourse.

"At least 5,000 people attended the event last year," Fox said. "This year we should at least have that amount, or better. We hope for a great crowd."

JASON WAGNER, senior in architecture, wins first place in the Bayer Stone Student Design Competition with a student design of the planned alumni center.

5th-year architecture students offer designs for planned alumni center

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Kansas limestone is a hallmark of K-State buildings — a unifying material giving the campus some coherence.

Students of fifth-year architecture design studios got the chance to develop a campus project, in this case the planned alumni center south of Memorial Stadium, specifically using stone as part of the Bayer Stone Student Design Competition. Bayer Stone of Manhattan sponsors the biennial competition as a way to increase designers' awareness of stone.

The winner of the competition, Jason Wagner, proposed a somewhat disjointed building, almost a series of pavilions, above underground parking. While it is no doubt a distinctly modern building, it subtly owes much to the traditional tower forms of the heavily rusticated, limestone-clad Memorial Stadium.

"I wanted to mediate between old architecture and new architecture on campus," Wagner said.

Piercing the building, which encompasses a central courtyard and unifies the alumni center, is a large glass atrium. Wagner said the glass element is partly to address the Ramada Inn across Anderson Avenue and to act as a beacon for visitors to the center.

The site posed several traffic and pedestrian challenges to the students. Wagner's design opens its various elevations with ramps and stairs punching through heavy walls to bring the circulation paths into the courtyard and to the glass beacon.

"I tried to focus all the currents to this piece," Wagner said.

Many of the same issues Wagner and other students have dealt with will now be passed along to Gossen Livingston Architects Inc. of Wichita, who were recently awarded the contract for the alumni center. Perhaps the most notable difference between the students' work and what lies before Gossen is design freedom.

Dan Spirey, a jury member of the competition and a Lincoln, Neb.-based architect, praised the students' manipulation of forms, but criticized some of those projects lacking site specificity and context.

"In this case, I wonder what a lot of the alumni's response would be to the designs," Spirey said.

The formal play in some of the projects lack precedent in Manhattan or at K-State for comparison.

Jo Noero, another jury member and architect and professor from Washington University in St. Louis, said the jury members asked themselves what made each building's form say it was an alumni center.

"The successful ones, you could tell," Noero said. "The unsuccessful ones could be anywhere."

There were two second-place winners, Miles Tolbert and Kimberly Murphy, and two third-place winners, Brent Crittenden and Oliver

2 students critically wounded in Ohio university stabbing

FAIRBORN, Ohio — Two students were stabbed repeatedly outside the library on the Wright State University campus and were hospitalized Wednesday in critical condition.

Thuy T. Mai, 21, and Eric K. Borten, 23, were attacked around midnight, both stabbed several times in the chest, Wright State spokesman Barry Johnson said.

"It appears that the assailant knew one of the victims," he said. "It was not a random act of violence."

Johnson said he didn't know why they were attacked or what kind of weapon was used. He said police are seeking a male suspect, who is not a student at the school.

He declined to identify the hospital where the victims were taken for security reasons.

Mai is a junior majoring in management information systems at the 16,000-student school. Borten is a senior majoring in biology. Their hometowns were not immediately available.

Wright State police gave no details, referring all calls to Johnson.

Cat lost in Hurricane Bertha found in area animal hospital

WILMINGTON, N.C. — Fifteen months had passed since Hurricane Bertha ripped ashore and Paulette Tipton's cat, Tiger, disappeared.

Then she saw the classifieds: "FOUND CAT: Yellow and white, long hair, male. Found 10/23, Bethel Road area. Call Needham Animal Hospital."

Could it possibly be?

Tipton telephoned the hospital, drove over to have a look and there he was. Tiger, long lost Tiger.

While making preparations for Hurricane Bertha, the family lost track of the cat. They had just moved to Wilmington, and Tipton said she thought the unfamiliar surroundings and the blasting winds of that summer day in 1996 might have killed Tiger.

It turns out Tiger had been just a few miles away the whole time, using his charm to receive food from strangers.

A woman whose house he sought out in recent weeks had taken him to the animal hospital, thinking he was better off being put to sleep than homeless. Mercifully, the hospital placed the ad instead.

Tiger, 14, reclined on a plaid couch Tuesday afternoon, nursing an infected bite wound on his head but otherwise appearing fit. His future travels will be limited.

Man jailed after police mistake his vitamins for illegal drugs

NORTH CHARLESTON, S.C. — For six weeks, Malvin Marshall sat in jail because police thought he was carrying heroin in his pocket. Police didn't believe him when he said it was mushy vitamins.

On Monday, the charges were dropped. Lab tests showed he was telling the truth.

The substance was found in a small bag in the watch pocket of Marshall's pants when the 27-year-old man was taken to the hospital Sept. 17 with an undisclosed illness.

"I didn't know it was there," Marshall said. "The tablets were all mushy. They had been washed in the washing machine."

Police performed a field test and concluded the substance was three grams of heroin. But follow-up tests by the state crime laboratory proved otherwise.

"The field test positives are not foolproof," police Lt. Melvin Cumbee said.

The field test involves looking for color changes in an acid that is applied to the substance. The test results can be affected by residue such as laundry detergent.

Almost 850 motorists fined in K-177 construction zone

TONYA ALLOWAY
staff reporter

Heather Reed, junior in elementary education, was driving through the construction zone on Kansas Highway 177 in May when she saw the "Give 'Em A Brake" sign.

Fines double in work zones, it read. She slowed down a little, but because she was late for an appointment, she just said a quick prayer and kept on going.

Ten minutes later and $81 poorer, Reed was pulling back on to the highway, wishing she had paid a little more attention to the sign.

Reed isn't alone. Almost 850 motorists were given similar citations throughout the construction of Kansas Highway 177, and another 248 received warnings. The citations are a way for the Kansas Highway Patrol to control the number of accidents in work zones, John Eichkorn, trooper and public information officer, said.

"We do try to concentrate our time in sites where construction is being done," he said. "Workers have been struck and even killed because drivers aren't obeying the law."

Eichkorn said it isn't a reflection on the drivers on the highway, but more a reflection that more cars are being driven in the area. He said Kansas Highway 177 was under construction because of the amount of traffic and number of accidents on the road.

"It's one of the main arteries into Manhattan from the interstate," he said. "That's one of the main reasons it was upgraded from a two-lane to a four-lane."

Eichkorn said as long as there are human beings, citations will exist.

"Humans are late to work, to doctor appointments, or plain in a hurry," he said. "As long as you have them driving through these zones, they will need someone to monitor these zones."

He said the fact that Kansas Highway 177 is right off the interstate isn't an excuse, even though it is heard a lot.

"That might be one reason for the citations," Eichkorn said.

The idea of the "Give 'Em A Brake" program, which began in 1993, is to make drivers more cautious in work zones.

Reed said although she had been given two warnings, she continued to speed. However, after she received the citation, her attitude changed a little.

"I was more cautious afterward, definitely when I saw work areas, but I still speed," she said. "The warnings didn't stop me from speeding. That's why I got the ticket."

Reed said she respects the work zone program more now.

"It's got a purpose," she said. "People will do what they want and pay no attention to speed limits, and then

UPC sponsors children's carnival to celebrate Halloween with safety

LINDSEY FORTMEYER
staff writer

There's something spooky lurking within the walls of the K-State Student Union. Tonight the Union Program Council will have its annual Children's Carnival.

"The carnival gives the children of Manhattan and students with children at K-State the opportunity to have fun in a safe and friendly atmosphere," Mike Hodgson, senior in English and president of UPC, said.

The activities for children include games, candy and prizes. Booths will be set up for pumpkin decorating, basketball-hoop games and other carnival-style events.

"Last year we had around 600 attendants, but this year we've handed out flyers to children, posted events in bulletins and targeted our publicity around off-campus community and children to bring in a more nontraditional crowd," Hodgson said.

UPC Feature Films and Kaleidoscope Films committees will also be showing "The Rocky Horror Picture Show" at midnight Friday and Saturday in the Main Ballroom.

A costume is not required at any event. The Children's Carnival is from 4 to 9 tonight in the Main Ballroom. Events are free to the public.

Geography interim head maintains vision for strong teaching department

CATHY BACH

A cardboard figure leans against the wall by a file cabinet in Chuck Martin's office. Around its neck is a red tie and clasped in its right hand is an empty beer can. On the back are messages written to Martin by colleagues and students before he went to Germany to conduct research on heavy metals in river systems.

Jokes such as, "Who's this guy?" and "I thought he'd be taller," come from colleagues to remind Martin he was missed while researching in Germany.

"They said he was put in my chair at staff meetings," Martin said with a grin on his face.

Chuck Martin, associate professor and interim headof the Department of Geography, said he applied for the full-time position because he has the qualifications for it.

"I think I work well with them (the department staff). I respect them and I think they respect me, and that's important to be able to work with people of diverse backgrounds and diverse opinions," Martin said. "I think I have a strong vision of the department retaining its historical roots and maintaining a very strong teaching department."

As a freshman at Dartmouth College in New Hampshire, Martin wanted to be a historian but then decided he preferred to be outside.

"At some point, I decided that I liked being out in the field," Martin said. "Probably in my first or second semester. I realized that I liked to be outside, that I liked to be out in the field, observing, taking measurements and collecting samples."

Martin said the only options for him were geology or geography. He said he decided geography had more human contact.

"I ended up in geography probably because I liked the fact that as a geographer I could deal with human activities and human impact, but also I can deal with the physical world," he said.

Martin decided he would teach after attending a semester of graduate school at the University of Kansas. He said teaching is still exciting for him.

"It's still exciting to go teach a course, give a lecture, even if I've done it eight or 10 times before for a particular class, it's fun to go in and do it," Martin said. "There are butterflies the first day of the semester, still."

In fact, one of the more difficult decisions Martin said he made was becoming interim head, because it means he will focus less on teaching.

"Teaching is always what I've loved to do, and it's what really attracted me to academia in the first place," he said.

Karen DuBres, associate professor of geography, said Martin is one of the best teachers in the department.

"He is extremely efficient and well organized," DuBres said. "He often wins teaching awards and has brought a lot of students into geography. Students respond to his open personality."

Eric Liggatt-Parr, graduate student in geography, said Martin keeps students' attention in class, and his classes are interesting.

"He's an excellent professor," Liggatt-Parr said. "I learned a lot about my teaching style from him."

DuBres said four years ago she and Martin organized a road rally for graduate students, faculty and geography majors. Each team was given a set of clues to get them to the finishing point, along with questions to answer along the way.

"It's kind of fun," Martin said. "It gets the grad students together as well as some of the undergrads."

Martin was named a Teacher-Scholar of the Association of American Geographers in 1994 and 1996. He also received the College of Arts and Sciences' William L. Stamey Teaching Award in 1991 and 1993.

Martin serves as the graduate program coordinator for geography, is a member of the course and curriculum committee, the National Resource and Environmental Sciences and the planning committee for the annual Water and Future of Kansas Conference.

Martin received his bachelor's degree from Dartmouth College and his master's and doctoral degrees from the University of Kansas.

Martin's area of interest is rivers. He received a fellowship from the Alexander von Humboldt Foundation of Germany in 1994 and researched and published the effects of heavy metal sediments in rivers.

Student Senate should be held accountable for past legislation

Think back to last year's student body elections and the election two years ago.

Both have something in common. Both were conducted without regard to existing procedural legislation. Student Senate, specifically the Elections Committee, was in error. Student senators were not aware of and did not follow the laws their predecessors instituted.

In 1990, Student Senate passed a bill that stated election polls were to be in the K-State Student Union and the Veterinary Medicine Complex only.

The past two years, polling stations have been in individual academic colleges. Last year, polling stations were also in dining centers.

Polling locations weren't the only mistake made in last year's elections. A polling station in Kramer Food Center closed about 30 minutes early.

Had the legal guidelines been adhered to, the election results might have been different. Regardless of the intent of the increase in polling locations, the fact remains that the elections were conducted improperly.

Senate needs to be held accountable. It is severely inappropriate for Senate to sweep its mistakes under the legislative carpet.

Senate has procedures to follow, for everything from conducting meetings to enacting laws. Those procedures are instituted for a reason.

When some laws are enforced and some are not, it sets a frightening precedent. There seems to be a double standard to laws that only affect senators.

If student senators ignore or do not refer to their own laws, the "elitist" stigma that is sometimes attached to SGA is reinforced.

Mistakes are going to happen — we're all human. But Senators must make every effort to avoid breaking laws. Consequences to Senate mistakes affect every student on this campus.

And if Senate is going to follow the "letter of the law," as Senate leadership says it must do, then it is imperative that they first know what their own laws say.

Relationships smerlationships

Rules of lovin' too hard to live by

A friend of mine recently gave me this equation — to figure out the youngest-aged person you can date and remain respectable, halve your age and add seven.

Being a returning "adult" student, I needed something like this.

I'm not sure where this equation came from, and I don't think it can be justified, but I really have no intention of trying to do so. I simply mention this because I think it would make things easier if there were more rules like that about relationships, hard and fast rules that could be figured on a calculator. Because, frankly, I'm lost.

Before we get into the meat of the topic, let me say that I am highly ambivalent about writing a column concerning relationships. I am not an expert in this area. Unlike most students here, I have documentation from the Pratt County Courthouse in Pratt, Kan., to back up just how much expertise I lack.

In case that's not enough to convince you, just stop my ex-wife on campus sometime and ask her. She's the one mumbling to herself about kitchen cabinet doors being left open (Before I receive a subpoena, I should point out that my ex is actually a wonderful, lovely person and remains a dear friend, even though it takes a certain alignment of the planets for us to show it).

My ignorance on the topic firmly stated, let's begin, shall we?

I think most of our problems with relationships come from the fact that at about age 10 we are given "the talk," and then Hollywood fills in all the pre-coital, premarital adult situations — but then, we're on our own. No one ever sits down and wants to talk about what comes after that, the period that someone once called "The Big Fade."

Hollywood has some great ways around this topic. Consider "Casablanca," in which the perfect guy is the one she leaves. Consider "The Bridges of Madison County," in which the perfect guy is the one who leaves. Consider "Phenomenon," in which the perfect guy is the one who dies. Maybe what they're saying in these movies, which are geared toward a definite female demographic, is not, "How sad that these perfect men had to leave," but rather, "These men are perfect because they left."

If Ilsa and Rick had left Casablanca for points west, settled down in some ugly post-war tract housing, gotten chubby, raised kids and taken up bowling, it might seem to most people that the sheen had been taken off their romance.

Another thing that gets me is when people end up together in a movie's denouement when they've been fighting each other tooth and nail throughout. Are we supposed to simply accept their relationship as valid? I did most of my life. I blame Spencer Tracy and Katherine Hepburn for my failed attempt at dating a Republican.

I know it sounds like I'm just bitching at this point, but can I really be the only person with these problems? I think not.

Good people of the jury, I would like to admit into evidence article A: studies on the rising phenomenon of Internet-based relationships. If it pleases the court, may I present article B: personal ads from primary newspapers from across the United States.

We all search for romance in our own way, and it seems very few of us really know what others want. Some are even more incapable of understanding what they themselves want and need, because we've been taught that certain things are what make up romance — love is all it takes, omnia vincit amor, etc.

But delve into that personals section once and you will feel the insincerity, the unwritten question in each letter, "Is this what you want?" I mean, come on. Are there really that many people who want to take long walks on the beach? Does everyone else in the world really love to go dancing, or is that just supposed to ring some bells?

When it comes down to it, I can only offer more questions. I don't really understand how things are supposed to work anymore (and I just don't seem to have the energy to figure it out at this point in my life). There are very few strict rules governing relationships, and none of them are written down. As a friend of mine told me the other day, you usually only learn the rules once you've broken one.

I would like to recommend, however, that you always shut the kitchen cabinets.

Sharpen your interview skills

You will need them

RECRUITERS TRY TO FIND EXCUSES NOT TO HIRE YOU

VIEWPOINT

MAJED KHAN

MAJED KHAN is a graduate student in electrical engineering. You can send e-mail to Majed at majed@ksu.edu.

Interview skills were once something you had to master to land that first job out of school, and then perhaps dust off once or twice again over the next few decades if you changed employers.

Career options, employer expectations and economic conditions now mean that people are looking for work or switching jobs more often, forcing them back into the interview arena as frequently as every few years.

At the same time, the target has become a moving mark — being interviewed in the 1990s is no longer just a formal 20-minute exchange about education, experience and where-do-you-see-yourself-in-five-years sort of thing.

Now the interview process can start online, by phone or fax. It can progress to a face-to-face meeting with a recruiter who asks probing behavioral questions to get you to describe how you've handled yourself in the past.

It can move to a panel interview with the managers and colleagues you'd actually be working with and who might have final say over whether you join their team.

So once you've created a fabulous electronic résumé, networked through e-mail with colleagues in your field and culled all the great offers from online job banks, you're still facing the traditional big hurdle in the career hunt — the interview.

Most people dread job interviews more than any other part of the search for work. Career counselors flood students with common-sense articles and reports. Research the company, prepare your answers, dress properly and take control of the conversation.

An interview is, essentially, a sales meeting where the product you are pushing is yourself.

I remember myself being asked once by an interviewer, "Are you marketable?" Although his remark made me feel like a fresh vegetable in the market, I felt great.

The economy was good, and the city I was interviewing in had a jobless rate less than 4.7 percent for that quarter.

Some see interviews as their chance to unearth whatever disqualifies you. Those interviewers are likely to rely on standard "tough questions" in their effort to figure you out.

Think about these potential questions before the interview:

- "Tell me about yourself."
- "What are your weaknesses?"
- "What are your strong points?"
- "How do you think you'll fit in best?"
- "What kinds of people rub you the wrong way?"
- "Why did you leave your last job?"

My numerous interview experiences have taught me that interviewers are now relying on a technique that psychologists began perfecting in the early 1980s — the behavioral interview. The idea was to turn the interview on its head — make it active rather than passive.

So the interviewer's question went from "Tell me how you would ensure our customers are happy" to "Give me an example of a time when a client of yours tried to cancel an order and describe what you did to save the project."

Interviewers like these questions because what you've done in the past tells them the most about what you're likely to do in the future. Job applicants hate them for obvious reasons.

If you're not prepared for this behavioral approach, you can freeze in the interview. If you are prepared, you'll walk a delicate line in phrasing and presenting your answers in the best possible, but still honest, light.

Answering these intrusive questions aren't usually enough to really please the toughest interviewer or to outshine the fiercest competition.

Show, don't tell, seems to be the rule of thumb for these recruiters. They want to hear about a candidate's experiences in thoughtful, descriptive, even entertaining detail.

Recruiters during interviews also register information about you on a second level. It begins with the physical impression you make: your voice, body language, eye contact, expressions. It includes your attitude and whether you hit it off with the interviewer, your enthusiasm and your self-confidence.

You'll need to research the business so you can talk about a specific department or several areas, depending on the job opening. Your answers should show you know a department might be expanding or the company is adding new clients. You should demonstrate interest in the company beyond a regular paycheck.

Know when to keep your mouth shut, too. An interviewer who asks about your weaknesses and then sits back in silence might be waiting to see if you prattle on unnecessarily.

Tell them instead about a couple of carefully chosen characteristics you feel you can improve but are not crucial to your job performance. Then wait quietly for the next question.

The hardest question might be the request to describe yourself. For this part of the interview, it's best to have a short, prepared monologue about your successful work history, projects that interest you and ways you have met and overcome challenges in the past.

Make your tone conversational. Imagine yourself describing the same accomplishments to a new acquaintance over dinner.

Of course, as much as technology and the economy change the interview process, some things remain the same. Always send a thank-you note after the interview.

And if you don't get the job, call the interviewer and ask why. Let them know you are ready to improve and you want to stay in touch.

If nothing else, the interviewer might then become a part of your networking web.

'Lynch Mob' not meant to be offensive nickname for team

Editor,

I am writing in response to Scott McKinney's letter on Tuesday regarding the negative connotations of the nickname "Lynch Mob."

In his letter, McKinney states the Wildcat defense has been given an inappropriate nickname because it is in reference to the hunting down of African-Americans. I think he makes a noteworthy point, and I appreciate his point of view.

However, it is my understanding the defense itself came up with this nickname, not the media or students. In fact, it is my understanding that the nickname has been around for a few years. If this is in fact true, I would hasten to say the members of the football team did not intend to offend anyone with the nickname.

Personally, when I heard the nickname, I pictured a posse in a western movie going after a criminal, much like the way our defense swarms around opposing running backs.

McKinney is right, though. Our defense is great and deserves a great nickname. If individuals are offended by the nickname, perhaps we should find a better one.

Student participants make fair positive view of K-State

Editor,

We would like to extend our heartfelt thanks to all students who provided volunteer time at the Health Professional School Fair on Oct. 23.

We'd especially like to thank Amber Smies, who coordinated the volunteer workers; Kim VanMeter, who created the bulletin board in the K-State Student Union; and Melanie Earnhart, who created three promotional posters.

The Fair participants made glowing comments about the courtesy and helpfulness of our students. It is very nice for campus visitors to have such a positive view of our students and K-State.

Thanks again to all who were willing to volunteer.

Cats for Cans begins annual food drive

ANGELA BUCCIGROSSI
staff reporter

Seventeen fraternity and sorority housemothers were "kidnapped" late Monday evening and held for ransom. The price for their freedom went to help Riley County's hungry families.

The kidnapping, sponsored by the Lambda Chi Alpha fraternity, was one of the first fund raisers for the Cats for Cans food drive.

The housemothers were kidnapped and taken by limousine back to the Lambda Chi house for an evening of fun and socializing. Fraternity and sorority members then paid a $40 ransom to have their housemother safely returned home. The event earned $680 to be given to the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

The Cats for Cans food drive is the university-wide food collection that helps the Breadbasket feed thousands of Riley County residents during the holiday season.

"Basically, it provides most of the food for their Thanksgiving and Christmas food baskets," Emily Emerson, Cats for Cans chairman, said.

The program started in fall 1993 and was originally called the 30 Days of November. The food drive took place from Oct. 15 to Nov. 15 to help the Breadbasket with its holiday demands, Shirley Bramhall, executive director of the Breadbasket, said.

Soon after it began, organizers realized the Breadbasket needed more help and the food drive offered a great opportunity for students to get more involved with helping in their community, she said.

The project is now called Cats for Cans, and last year, campus organizations raised 70,000 pounds of food.

The food helped the Breadbasket prepare 14,000 Thanksgiving baskets and 15,000 Christmas baskets, which were given to hungry families for the holidays.

"If it wasn't for Cats for Cans, the Thanksgiving baskets would barely exist. Now we can really put them together," Bramhall said.

This year, Cats for Cans has increased their goal to 90,000 pounds of food, a 20,000 pound increase from last year's goal.

"I think it's really great Cats for Cans has raised their goal, because the need has certainly increased," Bramhall said.

Riley County is number one in the state of Kansas for poverty and one in five people in the county are at or below the poverty level, she said.

Emerson said she feels the new goal of 90,000 pounds is possible if the entire campus gets involved.

"We're all in different groups, so if we network, we can get the whole campus involved," she said.

Various groups on campus have already begun working on projects and activities to help with the drive. During Homecoming, 3,000 pounds was collected at the preliminary body building competition.

"I loved seeing all the cans come in and pile up," Emerson said.

Lambda Chi Alpha fraternity will collect cans at the K-State vs. Colorado football game on Nov. 18. The first 1,000 people to donate will receive purple and white pom poms, donated by It's Greek To Me Inc.

The Department of Architectural Engineering will construct a building made completely out of cans in Manhattan Town Center. Shoppers can donate either a can or a dollar for the chance to guess how many cans are in the structure and thus to win lots of different K-State prizes.

Several campus honoraries, such as Mortar Board senior honorary, have issued challenges to others honoraries to see which organization can gather the most cans.

Those who are in groups that might want to get involved should call the Breadbasket or attend the next meeting, Bramhall said.

The next meeting will be at 7 p.m. Nov. 13 in the Council Chamber in the K-State Student Union.

Students who would like to participate on an individual level can also get involved by volunteering or by donating cans.

"Everyone can get involved. There are never enough volunteers,"

BIG 12 SHAKEDOWN

BIG 12 WOMEN ANNOUNCE LINEUPS AT BIG 12 MEDIA DAY

TEXAS TECH LADY RED RAIDERS

Head coach: Marsha Sharp
Probable starters:

3	Melinda Schmucker	G, 5-9, sophomore
23	Julie Lake	G, 5-9, junior
24	Crystal Boles	C, 6-2, senior
33	Rene Hanebutt	G, 5-8, junior
43	Alicia Thompson	F, 6-1, senior

Thompson

NOTES: Texas Tech was picked No. 1 in the Big 12 Preseason Coaches' Poll. Senior Alicia Thompson was named Big 12 Preseason Player of the Year. Thompson was also named to the Big 12 Preseason All-Conference First Team. K-State knocked Texas Tech out of the Big 12 Tournament in the second round last season.

TEXAS LONGHORNS

Head coach: Jody Conradt
Probable starters:

14	Vanessa Wallace	G, 5-9, junior
23	Angela Jackson	C, 6-4, senior
24	Edwina Brown	F, 5-10, sophomore
25	Kim Lummus	G, 5-8, junior
45	Jaime Bailey	C, 6-2, senior

Conradt

NOTES: Texas was picked No. 2 in the Big 12 Preseason Coaches' Poll. Angela Jackson was nominated to the Big 12 Preseason All-Conference First Team in a tie for fifth. Texas lost to Notre Dame in the second round of the NCAA Tournament last season. Nine former Longhorns are playing in the WNBA and the ABL.

COLORADO BUFFALOES

Head coach: Ceal Barry
Probable starters:

14	Damietta Velicica	F, 6-0, senior
21	La Shena Graham	G, 5-3, senior
22	Alexis Felts	G, 5-6, senior
23	Ericka Bradford	F, 6-1, junior
44	Nikki Swagger	F, 6-3, freshman

Barry

NOTES: Colorado was picked No. 3 in the Big 12 Preseason Coaches' Poll. Colorado won the inaugural Big 12 Tournament last year, beating K-State 54-44 in the final game. Two of the Buffs' key players, La Shena Graham and Ericka Bradford, are from the Kansas City area. Colorado advanced to the Sweet 16 last year.

BAYLOR LADY BEARS

Head coach: Sonja Hogg
Probable starters:

5	Lara Webb	G, 5-10, junior
12	Toya Ellis	G, 5-5, junior
30	Nicole Palmer	F, 5-10, senior
32	Tasia Wright	G, 6-1, senior
42	Kacy Moffitt	F, 6-4, junior

Ellis

NOTES: Baylor was picked to finish No. 7 in the Big 12 Preseason Coaches' Poll. Nicole Palmer is originally from Overland Park, Kan. Lara Webb was chosen Big 12 Newcomer of the Year in the Big 12 Preseason Coaches' Poll. The Bears return a majority of their players, losing one letterwinner to graduation.

OKLAHOMA STATE COWGIRLS

Head coach: Dick Halterman
Probable starters:

10	Kourtney Bower	G, 5-7, junior
12	Sarah Boyd	G, 5-10, senior
24	Renee Roberts	F, 5-10, senior
32	Cheri Edwards	F, 6-2, senior
45	Devon Magness	C, 6-7, freshman

Roberts

NOTES: Oklahoma State was picked to finish No. 8 in the Big 12 Preseason Coaches' Poll. At 6 feet, 7 inches, Devon Magness is the tallest player in the conference. Renee Roberts was a Second Team All-Big 12 selection a year ago. Guard Sara Jackson is from Junction City, Kan. Fourteen of the Cowgirls' 16 players are from Oklahoma.

K-STATE WILDCATS

Head coach: Deb Patterson
Probable starters:

4	Brit Jacobson	G, 5-7, senior
23	Jenny Coalson	G, 5-11, junior
42	Angie Finkes	C, 6-1, sophomore
44	Ewa Laskowska	F, 6-0, junior
45	Nicky Ramage	F, 6-1, sophomore

Jacobson

NOTES: K-State was picked to finish No. 9 in the Big 12 Preseason Coaches' Poll. Coach Deb Patterson took the Wildcats to the first K-State appearance in the women's NCAA Tournament in 10 years in her first year as head coach last season. The Cats return senior Brit Jacobson, a Big 12 Preseason All-Conference First Team selection.

KANSAS JAYHAWKS

Head coach: Marian Washington
Probable starters:

4	Casey Pruitt	G, 5-6, freshman
11	Suzi Raymant	G, 5-11, junior
22	Koya Scott	C, 6-3, senior
34	Lynn Pride	F, 6-2, sophomore
43	Nakia Sanford	F, 6-3, junior

Washington

NOTES: Kansas was picked to finish No. 4 in the Big 12 Preseason Coaches' Poll. Kansas won the first Big 12 regular season championship with a 14-2 conference record. Lynn Pride played for the USA Junior World Championship Team, which won a gold medal this summer. The Jayhawks lost six players from last year's team.

NEBRASKA CORNHUSKERS

Head coach: Paul Sanderford
Probable starters:

25	Emily Thompson	C, 6-3, senior
30	Anna DeForge	G, 5-11, senior
31	Monet Williams	G, 5-7, junior

33	Charlie Rogers	F, 6-2, sophomore

DeForge

NOTES: Nebraska was picked to finish No. 5 in the Big 12 Preseason Coaches' Poll. Anna DeForge is on the Big 12 Preseason All-Conference First Team. Kate Benson is from Prairie Village, Kan. Head coach Paul Sanderford led Western Kentucky to three Final Fours.

IOWA STATE CYCLONES

Head coach: Bill Fennelly
Probable starters:

4	Stacy Frese	G, 5-8, sophomore
42	Amanda Bartz	G, 6-0, sophomore
45	Monica Huelman	F, 6-2, sophomore
52	Janel Grimm	F, 6-1, senior
53	Jayme Olson	F, 6-1, senior

Grimm

NOTES: Iowa State was picked to finish No. 6 in the Big 12 Preseason Coaches' Poll. In Bill Fennelly's second year as coach, he led his Cyclone team to its first NCAA appearance ever last season. Janel Grimm leads the team in rebounding with an average of 7.4 per game. Jayme Olson was named to the Big 12 Preseason All-Conference Team.

TEXAS A&M AGGIES

Head coach: Candi Harvey
Probable starters:

10	Kerrie Patterson	G, 5-8, junior
14	Prissy Sharpe	F, 6-1, sophomore
24	Amy Yates	G, 5-9, sophomore
31	Kim Linder	F, 6-0, senior
52	Quiana Harris	C, 6-3, junior

Harvey

NOTES: Texas A&M was picked to finish No. 10 in the Big 12 Preseason Coaches' Poll. The Aggies have only two non-conference home games and play 10 consecutive road games this season. Texas A&M won the final Southwest Conference Tournament in 1995. Amy Yates is No. 5 on the Aggies in three-point shooting percentage.

OKLAHOMA SOONERS

Head coach: Sherri Coale
Probable starters:

10	Roxanne Long	G, 5-8, senior
14	Jaimie Anderson	C, 6-3, junior
21	Stacey Dales	G, 6-0, freshman
22	Michele Workman	F, 5-11, junior
34	Phylesha Whaley	F, 5-10, sophomore

Long

NOTES: Oklahoma was picked to finish No. 11 in the Big 12 Preseason Coaches' Poll. The Sooners won their first conference game last year and lost their last 16. Phylesha Whaley won Big 12 Rookie of the Week honors twice last season. Stacey Dales was voted Preseason Freshman of the Year by the press.

MISSOURI TIGERS

Head coach: Joann Rutherford
Probable starters:

12	Tanisha Johnson	G, 5-8, senior
21	Debra Williams	G, 5-6, senior
31	Kesha Bonds	F, 6-1, junior
44	Julie Helm	G, 5-11, sophomore
45	Ekpedeme Akpaffiong	F, 6-0, sophomore

Bonds

NOTES: Missouri was picked to finish No. 12 in the Big 12 Preseason Coaches' Poll. Julie Helm garnered Freshman of the Year honors last season, averaging 17.5 points per game. The Tigers return all five starters and have four letterwinners and three freshmen this season.

Texas Tech prepares for Cats

SAM FELSENFELD
staff writer

Texas Tech was a Saturday away from being all but out of the Big 12 south title race.

If Oklahoma State would have beaten Missouri as expected, and if Texas Tech would have lost to Texas A&M as expected, the Red Raiders would have been 2-2 in conference play, two games behind the Cowboys with four to play.

But Missouri pulled off a 51-50 double-overtime win and Texas Tech beat the Aggies, 13-6. Instead of playing catch-up with Oklahoma State, the Red Raiders find themselves tied for first with four games left.

"Needless to say, Saturday was a big win for us," Texas Tech coach Spike Dykes said. "It was one of those knock-down, drag-out affairs we've had with A&M the past few years, and we were fortunate to come out on top."

Texas Tech will be host to K-State Saturday, but it is expected to lose. However, the Red Raiders will gun for two upsets in two weeks.

They're led by senior quarterback Zebbie Lethridge, a scrambling quarterback who is often compared — especially this week as Texas Tech prepares to play the Cats — to K-State's scrambling quarterback, Michael Bishop.

Last year Texas Tech played the Cats tough in Manhattan, running 103 plays from scrimmage before losing 21-14. However, this year the Red Raiders are without running back Byron Hanspard, who rushed for more than 2,000 yards last season before going to the NFL.

So what does Dykes think the Red Raiders can do to run 103 plays and control the game again?

"There's not much we can do," he said. "Nobody's moved the ball against them (K-State) all year."

However, K-State coach Bill Snyder won't rest quite yet.

"I think, as always, a Spike Dykes-coached football team is going to be a tough game for anybody," he said.

Texas Tech enters the game 4-3, 3-1 in Big 12 play. The Red Raiders have won three of their past four games, losing only to No. 1 Nebraska. Also, they've won three of their four home games this season.

But, like Snyder, Dykes won't rest quite yet.

"We've got Kansas State staring us in the face," he said. "They're in the top 20, and they're 6-1. I imagine they're licking their chops."

Texas Tech has a relatively balanced offense. The Red Raiders average 154.1 yards a game on the ground, and pass for another 192. However, they also have a relatively balanced scoreboard. They average 24.4 points a game, and give up 22.7.

Considering the Cats haven't scored fewer than 23 points in a game this season and are averaging 36.7, the Red Raiders will probably have to step up their offense performance to come out on top.

And how does Dykes think they match up with K-State's defense?

"Not very good," he said. "Kansas State is awesome. They're awesome on defense, and they're awesome on offense and they're awesome kicking. That's why they're a top-15 team."

Texas Tech will also battle injuries. The Red Raiders have nine injured players, including three who will not see any playing time this week.

"We've had our back to the wall every week. There's not many tomorrows left," Dykes said.

And to find a tomorrow, the Red Raiders will have to find a way to slow down Bishop. He rushed for negative two yards at Oklahoma last week, but was nursing a sore ankle and still managed to pass well enough to lead the Cats to a 19-point victory over the Sooners.

Dykes said after watching the film of that game, he knows his defense will have its hands full. Although the Sooners shut down Bishop on the ground, Dykes expects him to be healthy and ready on Saturday.

"Watching him last year at Blinn Junior College, you knew he knew what it takes to get it done," Dykes said. "I think he's relentless. It's gonna take more than I can explain to slow him down."

CONSPIRACY THEORIES

Politics, history are not the only issues infiltrated by conspiracies

VIEWPOINT

CRESTON KUENZI

CRESTON KUENZI is a junior in computer engineering. You can send e-mail to Creston at creston@ksu.edu.

There have been many allegations of conspiracies in our society over the years.

There are those who claim there were several groups, including the CIA, behind President Kennedy's assassination. Others are convinced the U.S. government has been covering up knowledge of beings from other planets for years. Still others say Neil Armstrong's one "giant leap for mankind" actually took place on an elaborate studio set in Hollywood.

I don't have the foggiest idea whether any of these conspiracy theories are correct, but they got me wondering what kind of underhanded things were happening in sports.

After some exhaustive research and a little imagination, I've come up with some conspiracies of the sports world. You might be surprised what I uncovered.

Believe it or not, one of the most shocking discoveries I made during my research revolves around the K-State football team.

The Wildcats' quarterback, Michael Bishop, is not a person. He's a robot created by head coach Bill Snyder. You don't believe me? Well, let's review the facts.

The reason Snyder chose to come to K-State several years ago wasn't because he wanted a challenge. He came to K-State because it's an engineering school with the resources necessary to create the ultimate weapon, Michael Bishop.

Still don't believe me? Well, the past couple of weeks, Snyder hasn't let Bishop talk at the postgame press conference. I have a strong suspicion there's a quirk in Bishop's audio components.

In addition, when Bishop hurt his leg in the Texas A&M game, Snyder had several of his players create a wall between Bishop and the ABC cameras. I suspect there were a few loose wires hanging out of Bishop's leg.

My only question is why Bishop, as a robot, would allow Nebraska to beat him for the first time. The only solution I could come up with is the Huskers have a few cyborgs of their own.

My second conspiracy theory surrounds Cal Ripken Jr.'s streak for the Baltimore Orioles. A source within the organization tells me it actually took five clones of Ripken to accomplish the feat. The whole thing was sponsored by Major League Baseball in an effort to bring some excitement back to the game.

The original Ripken retired in 1989 and is living the rest of his days on a secluded island in the Caribbean.

The third conspiracy I uncovered involves this year's World Series. After doing some digging, I found out the Florida Marlins' championship was all a

Exhibit displays narrative art

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Noticeably absent from art in the 1960s and 1970s is any form of narrative or storytelling.

The high abstraction and minimalist movements of those two decades stripped mainstream art of any social or historical narrative. Painted lines on canvas do not speak to different cultures, let alone the casual museum visitor.

Art Review

It wasn't until the 1980s that art began to relish narrative again, albeit with mixed results.

The slow ushering in of the politically correct movement after the 1970s is now culminating in the well-choreographed ballet of feelings, cultural pride and you-can't-understand-me-because-you-aren't-me psychosis that is the 1990s.

In this vein, narrative artists are being rediscovered (or exploited) as an alternative to artists who are more obsessed with art and art history than the relation of their work to social history. It's an illustration of the cycles of art fashion, making even marginal regionalists suddenly important.

From somewhere in this P.C. universe emerges the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art exhibition "African-American Works on Paper," a collection of art from the Georgia-based Cochran Collection that will be on display until Jan. 4.

I bring up the narrative discussion because the better works in this exhibition deal with it, in some cases almost at the expense of the art itself.

Take Jacob Lawrence — surely the most notable black American artist of the 20th Century. Lawrence's "Revolt on the Amistad," a silkscreen on paper (1989), may be a riot of color and intertwined surface forms, but the purely artistic considerations serve best to emphasize the narrative, that being the true story of an uprising on a slave ship.

Lawrence is the grandfather of modern black history and social painting, having in the 1930s turned to his native Harlem to record the community around him. His paintings have, over a long career, explored such historical figures as Frederick Douglass, Harriet Tubman and John Brown, while avoiding politically correct cliché.

Lawrence and other artists in the exhibition illustrate how African-American culture is perhaps best told through its tumultuous history, which has been central to the contemporary black experience. The narrative is found in their art simply because it has to be.

Hilton Kramer, in a May 26, 1974, New York Times review of Lawrence's work, wrote that the artist working in a historical context must possess "a supreme conviction about the importance of his subject. He requires, in addition, a public — though not necessarily or even primarily what we normally think of as an 'art public' — that shares this attitude toward his subject."

The narrative is again found in Romare Bearden's provocative "The Family," etching on paper (1975), and Allan Edmonds' "Playtime: Inner City," silkscreen on paper (1976). Both utilize collage by pulling together a collection of images, both from the artist and popular culture, to recontextualize them in a social milieu.

Although this exhibition only includes work since the 1920s with some emphasis on the 1980s it encompasses everything from the segregation of the first half of the century to the 1960s civil rights movement tothe pride movements of contemporary culture. And not all of it is narrative.

Joe Overstreet's "Mahogany Hall," silkscreen on paper (1989), celebrates the effusive sounds of jazz with explosive colors. Sam Gilliam's "Dreamless Romances," mixed media on paper (1988), geometrically relates bright hues of red, orange and yellow.

The art museum's connection to this show, if you're wondering, is the medium of paper; the museum's holdings are strongest in this sense. Last year's exhibition of works on paper from Arkansas and the Cochran Collection underscore how artists can sometimes be freer with paper than a more finished medium of oil on canvas.

Seemingly simple works, like Elizabeth Catlett's spare portrait of a devout woman, "Virginia," lithograph and collage on paper (1984), reveal the psychological power some of the portraits in the exhibition possess.

The fears and dreams one faces in life is evoked gracefully in John Wilson's "Dialogue," etching on paper (1973), which portrays a young boy proudly looking past a haunting skull.

While the Cochran Collection is perhaps a bit too diverse for its own good — one could easily make three more coherent shows out of this one — the little narratives in a handful of works are the treasures lurking beneath the surface.

Pacino at his most evil in 'Advocate'

DEVIL'S ADVOCATE

BYRON VOGEL
staff reporter

See if this sounds familiar: a hotshot young hunk of a lawyer receives a lucrative contract offer from an urban law firm. He and his wife move into a beautiful new home, courtesy of the firm, and all is well until they realize the firm has plunged them neck-deep into a world of crime, corruption and murder.

In "The Devil's Advocate," that's exactly what we get. Like a lawyer joke gone bad, however, the firm's boss is not a mafia chieftain, but the Prince of Darkness himself.

Keanu Reeves stars as Kevin Lomax, a Jacksonville, Fla., defense attorney who's never lost a case. He catches the attention of New York lawyer John Milton, played by a slick, savvy and always-smiling Al Pacino.

Milton soon becomes the dominant influence in Kevin's life. Kevin's wife, Mary Ann (Cherlize Theron), sits alone in the couple's spacious penthouse while Kevin and Milton pal around at sporting events and strip clubs deep into the night. Kevin's devotion to his job and to Milton immediately puts a strain on the marriage.

Movie Review

Mary Ann is the only one who can see the evil in Milton and the law firm. She begins to have a series of horrifying experiences she can't explain. Kevin, blinded by a high-profile murder trial, ignores Mary Ann's pleas to the point of insanity. When, before her very eyes, one of the partners' wives mutates into a demon, it becomes startlingly apparent "The Devil's Advocate" is no longer a legal thriller.

This neglect, coupled with his unrelenting ambition, puts Kevin on a one-way path to damnation, and John Milton is standing at the gate to greet him.

Though small and unassuming on the outside, Pacino is larger than life. He embodies greed, lust, vanity and all things evil, and talks about them so brazenly it will make you squirm. The way he toys with Mary Ann — desecrating her body and injecting demonic visions into her mind — is so twisted and sadistic it makes early Pacino characters like Michael Corleone and Tony Montana seem like downright pleasant fellows.

Disgusting indeed, but like the temptation he offers Kevin at every turn, he is irresistible and unpredictable. When he picks up the phone and asks his secretary to page an associate of the firm, he is actually dispatching his minions to commit murder. All with a toothy smile, of course.

In the climactic confrontation between Milton and Kevin, Pacino stretches the limits of his wizardry. One moment he is unleashing a fiery monologue about God (with enough cruelty to make an atheist blush); the next he is dancing and lip-synching to the Frank Sinatra version of "It Happened in Monterrey." Only Pacino could get away with such a thing.

Reeves, who received top billing over Pacino, peppers his monotone dialogue with a fake southern drawl. His portrayal of the same shallow character who surfaces in all of his films makes you wonder exactly how many times Pacino rolled his eyes during shooting.

Theron, on the other hand, is terrific as the unconventional damsel in distress. As her character slowly loses her mind, Theron displays a very genuine terror. It's impossible not to suffer along with her as she gradually deteriorates into paranoia.

Dull and outworn clichés about lawyers selling their souls to defend guilty clients abound. Surprisingly, however, "The Devil's Advocate" speaks volumes about the husband–wife relationship and the personal responsibility therein. Like some sort of shock treatment for wayward souls, the film spooks us into accepting that, when given the opportunity to exercise their free will, people will damn themselves nine times out of 10. Instead of Al Pacino with a pitchfork, the devil is merely our own conscience — that little impulse inside of us to choose what we know is immoral and unethical.

Whether movie audiences will flock to see "The Devil's Advocate" in search of answers to the great moral questions of our time is doubtful at best. If it's a truly shocking horror film they seek, it doesn't get much better than this.

After all, 'tis the season.

Scientists to develop new technique to kill salmonella, E. coli in animals

ASSOCIATED PRESS

GRIFFIN, Ga. — Faced with outbreaks of salmonella and E. coli, scientists are developing a better way to protect food: killing deadly bacteria in the bowels of chickens and cattle before the animals even leave the farm.

"We've concentrated on the end product of food so long, when we should be looking at how to stop it from being contaminated in the first place," said Lester M. Crawford, director of the Center for Food and Nutritional Quality at Georgetown University in Washington, D.C..

Salmonella, campylobacter and toxic forms of E. coli all get their start in animals' intestines. They can spill out in the slaughterhouse and make their way into food.

Chickens are sprayed with chlorine and quick-chilled to retard bacteria. Inspectors touch, sniff and sometimes test animal carcasses for contamination. Another method, in which bacteria are killed with zaps of radiation, has proved too controversial for widespread use in this country.

In a lab in this Georgia town, food scientist Michael Doyle looked inside a cow's stomach for a way to kill E. coli 0157:H7, the mutant microbe blamed in the recall of 25 million pounds of ground beef this summer.

Doyle found that several types of bacteria inside the cow make their own repellent against E. coli 0157, so he took those bacteria from cattle droppings and tissue, grew them in the lab and fed them to calves in their milk.

The bacteria not only wiped out E. coli 0157 in one group of calves within three weeks, it also kept the bacteria from invading a second group, said Doyle, who runs the University of Georgia Center for Food Safety and Quality Enhancement.

Doyle hopes his work will lead to a product that could be fed to cows to clean them out before they are sent to slaughter. He is hoping to get his product to market within three years, at a cost of about $1 per animal.

"This type of technology is exactly what we need if we are going to keep the bacteria out of the food supply," said Caroline Smith Dewaal, director of food safety for the Center for Science in the Public Interest, an independent consumer advocacy group. "We need to have farmers address the bacteria before the cattle go to slaughter."

Several researchers are working on a similar concept in chickens.

A new oral vaccine aimed at cutting down salmonella infections from eggs and poultry could be available for farmers by early next year.

Developed by biologist Roy Curtiss III of Washington University in St. Louis, the vaccine is a weakened form of salmonella that allows the bird's defenses to fight off infections.

Scientists at the U.S. Department of Agriculture's Research Service in College Station, Texas, have also patented a mixture of bacteria from a chicken's gut that wards off salmonella in chicks.

The mixture is now being sold overseas. The approach is awaiting approval in the United States from the Food and Drug Administration.

In Canada, Andy Potter and his colleagues at the nonprofit Veterinary Infectious Disease Organization are also working on an E. coli vaccine for chickens. They hope eventually to develop a supervaccine that can also fight salmonella and campylobacter.

Many types of E. coli are present in humans and animals and aid digestion. But the toxic form E. coli 0157 serves no purpose; neither does salmonella or campylobacter.

Killing bacteria inside animals isn't foolproof. Doyle, for example, still has to find out how long his method will keep E. coli at bay and whether the bacteria will interfere with other animal antibiotics.

But the scientists see their approach as part of a series of checkpoints from the farm to America's dinner table. Now, much of the burden rests on whoever is in the kitchen to make sure the beef and chicken are cooked thoroughly to destroy any deadly bacteria.

"Food safety begins when the animal is born," Potter said.

Paula Jones seeks to drop defamation charge against trooper after lawyers question witnesses about her past

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. — The woman suing President Clinton for sexual harassment wants to drop her claim that a state trooper's depiction of her as an eager mistress tarnished her reputation.

Paula Jones filed a motion to amend her lawsuit Tuesday, less than two weeks after lawyers for trooper Danny Ferguson began questioning potential witnesses about her past.

Bill Bristow, Ferguson's attorney, has defended the questioning, saying it's his job to "determine what her reputation was."

Jones' lawyers have begun talking to potential witnesses about Clinton's past, and one scheduled for a deposition next month is Gennifer Flowers, who claims she had a long romantic relationship with Clinton. She has been subpoenaed to give a deposition in two weeks.

Ferguson allegedly set up a hotel room meeting in Little Rock between Jones and then-Gov. Clinton in May 1991.

Jones' $700,000 lawsuit against Clinton and Ferguson alleges that Clinton exposed himself and asked her for oral sex. She was a state employee at the time and claims Clinton later used his influence to land her in a dead-end job.

Clinton has denied the allegations and said he does not recall meeting Jones.

Jones filed a defamation lawsuit against Ferguson, accusing him of being the source of a published account that depicted her as eager to be Clinton's mistress. If the loss-of-reputation charge is dropped, Ferguson will remain a co-defendant, accused of conspiring with Clinton to violate Jones' constitutional rights.

Defamation claims against Clinton have already been dropped.

As part of the quest for witnesses for Jones' case, a former high school classmate of Clinton was questioned for about four hours in Dallas on Tuesday. Dolly Kyle Browning has written a tell-all book that she said is loosely based on what she claims was a 33-year relationship with Clinton.

Flowers is scheduled to give Jones' lawyers a deposition in Dallas on Nov. 14.

"I don't think it comes as a surprise," her attorney, Rugger Burke, told The Dallas Morning News. He refused to speculate on what Flowers might be asked.

Flowers claimed during the 1992 presidential campaign that she had had a 12-year romantic relationship with Clinton while he was married. He denied that, butsaid he had caused pain in his marriage.

ELECTION

islation. It was more of an innocent appeal to try to get more students involved."

SGA Attorney General Bryan Wagner said if the election results are contested as a result of the new information, he would be willing to take the issue before Student Tribunal.

"If it is something the students feel should be addressed, I have no problem giving it to Student Tribunal to work out. It's not in my hands to decide whether this goes through or not," he said.

But later in the interview, Wagner explained that Tribunal members are appointed by elected SGA officials. When asked if that would make them unable to determine whether or not the elections were valid, Wagner said, "I guess that would be right."

He said if election results were contested, decisions about how to handle the problem might be deferred to the Office of Student Life, which oversees SGA.

Assistant Dean of Student Life Jon Kulaga would not comment late Wednesday afternoon. Kulaga said he had just heard about the mistake and would need time to review legislation before making a statement.

Looking to future elections, Student Senate will consider a revised set of election regulations at tonight's meeting. The new set of rules sets polling places at the K-State Student Union, Derby Food Center and Kramer Food Center, repealing previous regulations.

Next month's stadium expansion will not be affected by the oversight. It was designed with polls at the Union and Veterinary Medicine Complex, which complies with the 1990 bill.

In the end, Carney said the intent of adding polling places was to encourage student participation. However, procedure was violated, and if Senate follows the "letter of the law," previous elections have been invalid, he said.

"Were the elections valid? That's in definite question. Obviously, the election guidelines weren't even followed by the Election Committee themselves," Carney said. "But I don't think any candidate was at an advantage or disadvantage. The overall intent was to get more students to vote.

"I don't think any harm was done. It's just a question of us following procedures that we set out for ourselves."

URGE

However, he first put the projects in context by introducing the city of Johannesburg, South Africa, where all the projects were built. Noero practices architecture in South Africa but lives in St. Louis.

The slides illustrated a modern international city torn between the corrugated steel shanty towns of the suburbs, and the concrete and steel towers of the central city. Noero emphasized that architects see their roles as much larger in South Africa — as having a direct effect on peoples' lives.

He said 95 percent of all housing in South Africa is built by squatters on private property using cast-off materials.

"There's a fantastic vitality in these areas that is almost completely absent in all planned communities I've seen here," Noero said, adding that the shanty towns exist, however, in extreme poverty. He criticized the over-hyped New Urbanism of Seaside and Celebration, Fla., as sanitized villages lacking the happenstance, fluid qualities of South African villages.

To address the poverty of his country while keeping true to his principles, Noero designs small houses, shops and public buildings that use basic hardware-store materials and are assembled by untrained locals. None of his completed projects is air-conditioned or heated, an aspect that seems almost unthinkable in the United States.

Noero said architects must capitalize on local technology, climate and tradition because buildings must take cues from how people live at home.

He said buildings should be readable, in both construction and purpose, so people find them accessible. And yet none of Noero's projects lacked what could be conventionally considered style.

"The local hardware store becomes the source of architectural invention," Noero said.

A small home for a friend is simplified with pitched roofs, geometric windows and basic forms. Glass and openings are positioned to take advantage of wind and sun, winter and summer weather. Noero's ethos is for a loose architecture working with the local climate, not against it.

The very idea of a climate-controlled modernist box, like Throckmorton Hall, becomes ludicrous, because of the initial cost and the resources such a building requires.

If Noero was a bit harsh on the Warholian superstars of modern architecture, he's coming from a different political and social environment. Surely if there were a way to have exported Philip Johnson to South Africa, someone would have found a way.

FOOD DRIVE

Emerson said.

For those who feel they don't have time to volunteer for the food drive, they can help by giving a donation or a couple of cans.

Canned goods and other nonperishables may be deposited in the large canisters that will soon be placed at both Dillons grocery stores in Manhattan.

If deciding what to buy is a problem, just think of a holiday meal, Bramhall said.

"If they just think of what goes into a Thanksgiving or Christmas meal, they just need to pick up one or two of those items," she said.

Cats for Cans accepts cash donations.

"Cash is great too, because it can help buy turkeys and chickens.

"For every dollar that's donated, we can turn it into $7 worth of food," she said.

Cats for Cans will continue throughout the fall semester and all food collected stays in Riley County, she said.

"It's so amazing to watch things happen. Cats for Cans has so much energy," Bramhall said.

Three state troopers who have said they helped arrange sexual trysts for Clinton when he was governor are scheduled to give depositions next week.

Clinton lawyer Bob Bennett on Monday asked U.S. District Judge Susan Webber Wright to delay or halt questioning that he said was designed to harass and embarrass the president.

The judge took the request under advisement after a phone conference Monday night. She also ordered everyone involved in the case to stop talking about it publicly.

"The judge has concerns to make sure that the jury panel that hears this case is not affected by pretrial publicity," said Bristow, Ferguson's lawyer. He declined further comment.

BAYER STONE

Wischmeyer.

The competition was judged by Helen Maib, a Lawrence architect, Spirey and Noero. Noero presented the lecture "The Ghost of Culture: Reasserting First Principles" after the ceremony at 6:30 p.m.

Mark Shapiro, head of the Department of Architecture, said the competition allows students to look at the implications of stone as a building material.

"It's very seldom the case that students are asked to look at the application of a building material in any detail," Shapiro said.

Max Bayer, owner of Bayer Stone, said his main goal with sponsoring the competition is to put forward some money for a prize and see if students can come up with new and unusual ways to use stone.

"We're looking if we can provide a service to these students they can't get another way," Bayer said. "We remind these architects there are certain unique problems and benefits this stone has rather than man-made products, and books don't have the answers."

THEORIES

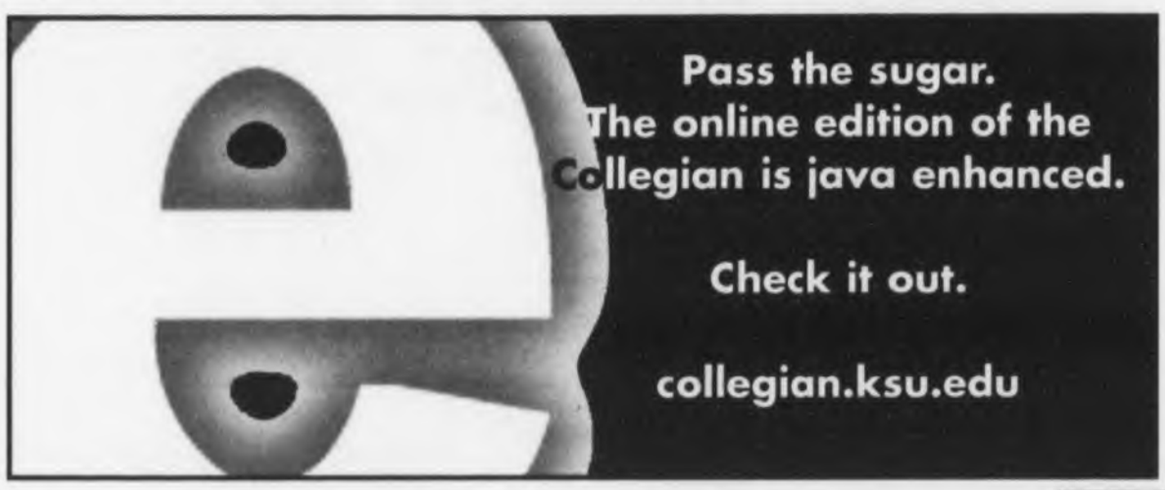
scam.

It turns out officials from the NFL hypnotized the players from the Orioles and the Atlanta Braves before the league championships and forced them to lose to Cleveland and Florida.

Why, you ask?



The majority of the fans wanted to see a Braves vs. Orioles match-up in the World Series, but the NFL stopped it from happening to keep baseball's popularity low and football the most popular sport in the country.

But the NFL's plan partly backfired when the series ended in exciting fashion in the 11th inning of the seventh game.

The final conspiracy is still a work in progress. The sentencing of Marv Albert, former basketball announcer for NBC and the New York Knicks, was postponed for one year, and the charges stemming from the biting incident will be dropped at that time if he stays out of trouble and seeks counseling.

It sounds awfully fishy to me that the judge would let Albert go without any jail time.

To be honest, I'm kind of nervous about writing this column because I'm afraid I might end up in cement shoes at the bottom of Tuttle Creek Reservoir if one of these theories turns out to be true. I guess I should look on the bright side. Maybe I'll get to find out what happened to Jimmy Hoffa.

New chimp exhibit at Sunset Zoo to open this weekend

The Sunset Zoological Park will open the addition of the Chimpanzees of Tanganyika exhibit this weekend.

These African chimpanzees include Suzy, who is about 42; Rachael, 23; Big Mac, born in the wild; and Teeoni and Teetoo, both 16 months old. They have not been able to roam around outside since they arrived at the Sunset Zoo.

The building that housed them was an indoor facility, so it prevented them from roaming outside.

The new facility has a 6,527-square-foot outdoor habitat area. The outside also has a window-viewing area for visitors.

There will be an indoor exhibit measuring 2,000 square feet. The indoor exhibit will have three dens, an exercise room, and storage and food-preparation areas.

"The previous exhibit was substandard. It didn't provide the animals outside accessibility," Angie Fenstermacher, Sunset Zoo marketing director, said. "The rooms inside were not that roomy for the animals, either."

The dens will give the zoo the ability to separate chimpanzees more efficiently for medical procedures, management and new chimpanzee introductions.

"Now we have an appropriate indoor exhibit, as well as a place to keep our colobus and blue monkeys," Fenstermacher said.

Fenstermacher said zoo officials hoped to have an indoor holding and viewing facility for the colobus and blue monkeys completed by spring 1998.

The chimp exhibit is the first addition to the African Forest Trail. The trail will create an African atmosphere for zoo guests with tropical landscaping and plants. The habitat will help make the chimps feel more at home, she said.

"When it gets cold outside, the chimps can choose if they want to go outside or stay inside and stay warm," Fenstermacher said.

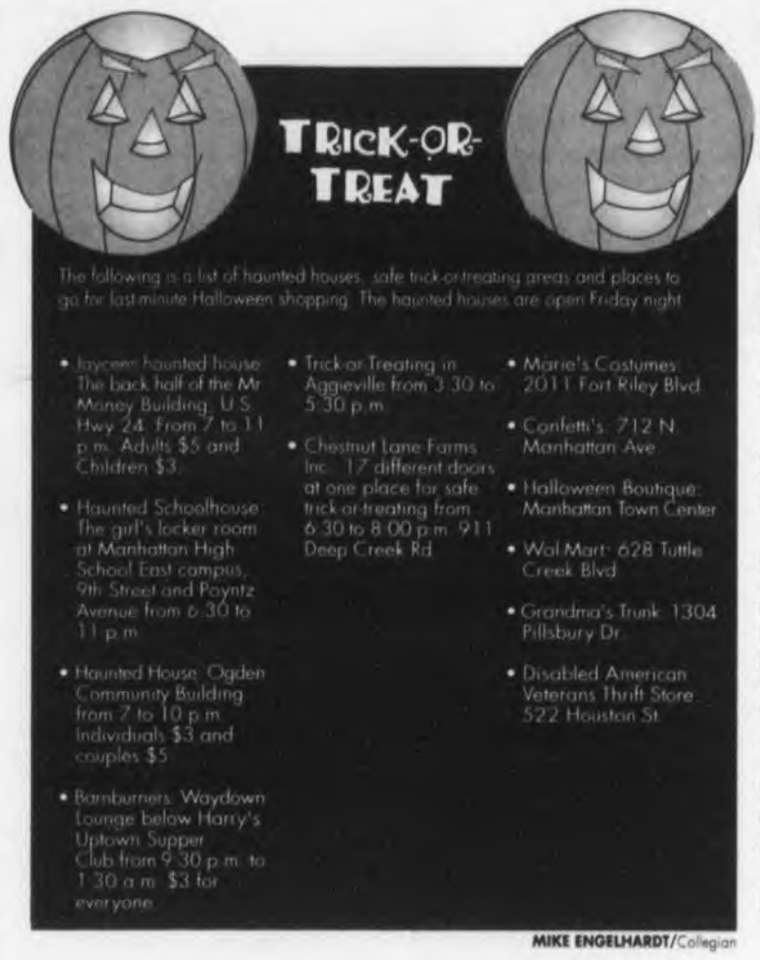
Fenstermacher said additional artificial lighting will be set on timers, which will simulate longer day length allowing the chimpanzees to experience lighting as they would in equatorial Africa.

Scott Shoemaker, Sunset Zoo director, said he has high hopes for the new exhibit.

"Right now we are an accredited and legitimate zoo, but with this addition I think people will be attracted to the new exhibit and see the zoo in a new light," he said.

The estimated cost of the trail and exhibit is $600,000.

The zoo has raised more than $60,000 through public sponsorships of the bricks used to build the exhibit. Sponsors had the opportunity to have an inscription of their choice engraved on the brick. Funding for the rest of the exhibit will be paid off through admission fees, gift shop and concession sales, and charitable gifts.



The grand opening for the African Forest Trail and Chimpanzees of Tanganyika will be Saturday and Sunday from 10 a.m. to 5:30 p.m.

SUZY is about 42 years old and has been at the Sunset Zoo for 23 years. Her new home at the zoo has three dens, an exercise room, and storage and food-preparation areas.

"NOW WE HAVE AN APPROPRIATE INDOOR EXHIBIT, AS WELL AS A PLACE TO KEEP OUR COLOBUS AND BLUE MONKEYS."

Halloween opportunities abound in Manhattan

ASHLEY YOULE
staff reporter

Halloween is celebrated every year by kids of all ages. No matter what day of the week, Oct. 31 is a night filled with ghosts, costumes, face paint and candy.

Halloween has its origins in the Catholic church, dating back to the fifth century B.C. The word "Halloween" comes from a contracted corruption of All Hallows Eve. All Hallows Day is also known as All Saint's Day, and it is celebrated Nov. 1. It is a Catholic day of observance in honor of saints, according to "History and Customs of Halloween," by Jerry Wilson at wilstar.net/hallown.htm.

Growing out of rituals of Irish Celts celebrating a new year and out of medieval prayer rituals of Europeans, Halloween is still a popular holiday.

This year there are many opportunities to get involved with Halloween. The K-State

Chinese president Jiang Zemin defends human rights practices during summit

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Facing a second day of withering criticism, Chinese President Jiang Zemin defended his human rights record to hostile lawmakers Thursday and later vowed to open China wider to the outside world.

Jiang

In back-to-back appearances before leaving Washington for a tour of America, Jiang tried to deflect attacks that began Wednesday with President Clinton.

"We believe without democracy, there can be no modernization," Jiang said to Asian specialists at a luncheon. "We will further improve our pattern of openness ... develop an open economy and open China still wider to the outside world."

The words of assurance were ringing hollow in Congress, where lawmakers asked China's president about repression in Tibet and abortions. The confrontation came a day after Clinton said Beijing was "on the wrong side of history."

"He got it from the president, and now he got it from Congress," House Minority Leader Dick Gephardt, D-Mo., said after lawmakers met with Jiang.

The Chinese president told members of Congress that, since his country opened to the world in the 1970s, "the Chinese people have enjoyed a much better life, and it has intensified efforts to improve democracy and the legal system." He urged efforts in improving and developing China-U.S. relations.

Although several lawmakers toasted Jiang at Wednesday night's White House state dinner, like Clinton, they obviously didn't mince words with him.

Jiang responded at the luncheon, saying, "Different views held by countries on the human rights issue ought to be addressed through dialogue so confrontation could be avoided."

He issued a similar hands-off warning to Clinton a day earlier, saying at a contentious news conference that China and the United States must have mutual respect for each others' values.

On the sensitive issue of Tibet, Jiang compared his country's actions to the liberation of American slaves. "People there are living in happiness and contentment," he said.

Again and again, the Chinese president offered democratic bromides, promising modern enterprise, a modernization drive and efforts to further enlarge democracy. At the same time, he talked about turning "China into a socialist country ruled by law."

One of China's harshest critics, Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said Jiang was evasive in his responses about forced abortion to curtail population growth, Tibet, religious persecution and weapons proliferation.

Jiang denied that China forces women to have abortions and said the government protects religious freedom and bars the sale of human organs for transplants, Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J., said.

Boeing signs $3 billion contract with China

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — In a celebratory Commerce Department ceremony, Boeing signed a $3 billion contract Thursday to sell China 50 jetliners, the largest aviation deal in the communist country's history.

President Clinton and Chinese President Jiang Zemin hailed the deal on Wednesday during their summit meeting at the White House.

"This contract will support tens of thousands of American jobs and provide China with a modern fleet of passenger planes," Clinton said during his joint news conference with Jiang. "China is the fastest-growing market in the world for our goods and services."

Ron Woodard, president of Boeing Commercial Airplane Group, and a Chinese aviation official signed the contract with Commerce Secretary William Daley and senior Chinese government officials looking on. Scores of employees from Boeing subcontractors in 42 states cheered in a Commerce Department ballroom decorated with miniature U.S. and Chinese flags and red, white and blue balloons.

"This is a great moment," said Phil Conduit, Seattle-based Boeing Co.'s chairman and chief executive officer. "The key to Boeing's success in what, I believe, will be the global century is open trade."

The deal, involving the sale of one 747, five 757s, eight 777s and 36 737s, could be a "turning point in U.S.-China trade," Daley said.

"It's a strong signal that China wants to build a stronger commercial relationship with the U.S., one based on cooperation and mutual benefits," he said. "It's a critical step in addressing our trade imbalance."

Chen Guangyi, minister of general administration for the Civil Aviation of China, signed for China. He called the signing "the largest trade event in the history of China aviation."

Senate rejects salary increases for SGA

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
staff writer

Back to the drawing board.

That's the message Student Senators sent to Student Governing Association's Joint Committee on Officer Compensation at Thursday night's Senate meeting.

On a 32-22 vote, Senate rejected the committee's report, which recommended compensation raises for several SGA positions.

Lengthy debate surrounded the resolution to reject the committee's report, which recommended pay increases for Senate officers, committee chairs and others within SGA.

Allocations Committee Chair Gabe Eckert, one of the resolution's authors, said K-State's student government is already successful without a pay raise.

"Two out of the past three years, our student government has been ranked as No. 1 for universities with 10,000 or more students, but our university holds another record which I am also very proud of. And that is that we are one of the lowest-compensated student governments in the nation," Eckert said.

Debaters on both sides of the issue raised issues of elitism, citing concerns that low salaries keep students from serving in SGA. But high salaries, others said, could lead to fee increases, which might keep potential students from attending K-State.

Engineering Sen. Carlton Getz, arguing for the increase, said low pay prevented students from considering service in SGA.

"By not giving a level of compensation, we're forcing other students out. We come here today and we say we have to make SGA as inclusive as possible.

"But yet to those who have to hold a job, we say, 'Huh-uh. You can run for office, but we can't pay you enough to give your best to this university. Go on. Get a job, because we can't pay you enough to stay,'" he said.

Aubrey Abbott, a member of the committee, said low salaries further students' opinions that SGA is elitist.

"Student government gets slammed a lot for not being diverse and not representing students, but I feel like by not compensating, we're excluding a lot of students.

Teen-ager convicted in shooting gets life sentence in Dodge City

DODGE CITY, Kan. — A 15-year-old convicted in the shooting death of a man and the wounding of another outside a museum was sentenced to life in prison for the killing.

Rafael Flores, who was 14 at the time of the incident, was sentenced Wednesday for the death of Justin Mercado, 18, outside the Boot Hill Museum in October 1996.

Prosecutors said Flores shot into a group of people gathered in the parking lot of the downtown museum.

Police said Flores had gang ties, but the victims did not.

Flores was also sentenced to an additional 34 months for shooting John Moses, 19, in the abdomen. The sentences will run consecutively.

Flores will serve part of his sentence at the Youth Center in Topeka until he is at least 16. He will be eligible for parole 15 years from the time he enters prison.

Fraternity gets harshest penalty for scavenger hunt in Indiana

BLOOMINGTON, Ind. — Fear and anger spread across the Indiana University campus because a fraternity played a prank that crossed the line, the dean of students said in handing down the harshest punishment available.

The university expelled Zeta Beta Tau on Wednesday for sending new pledges to search for 22 items, including photos of a midget, "2 chicks kissing (less clothes, more credit)" and "any funny-lookin' Mexican."

The penalty was harsher than that recommended by the university's Fraternity and Judicial Board, which had suggested suspending the historically Jewish fraternity through Jan. 1, 2000, followed by a year of probation.

"The actions of these young men generated fear and anger," Richard McKaig, dean of students, said. "Enough is enough."

The fraternity was earlier suspended by its national headquarters for the Oct. 15 scavenger hunt. The chapter president had apologized and asked fellow students to give the house another chance.

The expulsion means the fraternity's sign will be taken down, and the group will stop functioning as a student organization. Its 130 members can continue to live in the house, but separate disciplinary action could still be taken against those involved in the scavenger hunt.

McKaig said the expulsion was for an indefinite period of time.

Blizzard kills up to 20,000 cattle; dollar loss in millions for Kansas

Kansas feedlot operators cleared dead cattle out of their pens Wednesday after a weekend blizzard left thousands dead, many of which suffocated or drowned after they were buried in snowdrifts.

Livestock officials estimated that up to 2 percent of the state's cattle in feedlots were killed in the storm, with dollar losses in the millions.

"It could be up to 20,000 head, and that's only the death loss," said Kelly Loganbill, a spokeswoman for the Kansas Livestock Association in Topeka. It will be harder to put a figure on what it will cost to recoup weight losses suffered by cattle in the storm.

James Earl Ray in hospital again

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — James Earl Ray has been hospitalized for the eighth time since last December.

Ray, the confessed assassin of the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr., suffers from cirrhosis of the liver. He was in fair condition Thursday — upgraded from serious — at Columbia Memorial Hospital, spokeswoman Freda Herndon said. He entered the hospital Wednesday.

Ray, 69, underwent a series of tests. Herndon did not elaborate on results.

Ray, who is serving a 99-year prison sentence for the 1968 shooting of King, last month was denied a petition to be released on bail to go to a hospital out of state. He is seeking a liver transplant.

Ray pleaded guilty to killing King but recanted soon after and has sought a retrial since. He claims his gun was planted to frame him.

Speech team wins tourney in Nebraska

JULIE LINDAMOOD
staff reporter

K-State's individual events speech team traveled all the way to Omaha, Neb., just for a swing.

The Omaha Swing.

"A swing is when there are two tournaments at the same location in one weekend and you compete in both," Craig Brown, director of individual events, said. "At the Omaha Swing, Creighton University hosted the tournament on Saturday, and the University of Nebraska-Omaha hosted the tournament on Sunday."

For the first time in history, K-State's speech team left Omaha, Neb., with more than a good finish. They left with a win.

"I was pleased with the second at Creighton and then really happy that we stepped up the performances and the concentration in the second half to win UNO," Brown said.

Not only did the team win the Omaha Swing, but two K-State competitors also qualified for the American Forensics Association National Tournament in Arizona this April.

Christina Foust, senior in speech, qualified in informative and after-dinner speaking, and Christopher Piatt, sophomore in theater, qualified in dramatic interpretation.

Foust said she hopes this tournament is an indication of how the rest of the season will go.

"We're hoping to qualify somewhere between 50 and 60 different events for nationals," she said.

Of course, the team has until April to get into the swing of things.

Brown said team members improve by working with their coaches, looking at feedback from tournament judges and using peer coaching. Brown said peer coaching is an important part of the team's success.

"Students take responsibility not just for their performance, but for everybody's performance on the squad," Brown said.

Foust said students gain more experience when traveling together to compete.

"There's a lot of benefits to it," Foust said. "After four years of competition, the people and friendships that I got to make when traveling are the benefits that stick out the most in my mind."

Vampires, princesses and ghosts passed empty coffins through a ghostly fog as they entered Bramlage Coliseum on Thursday night for the all-greek philanthropy.

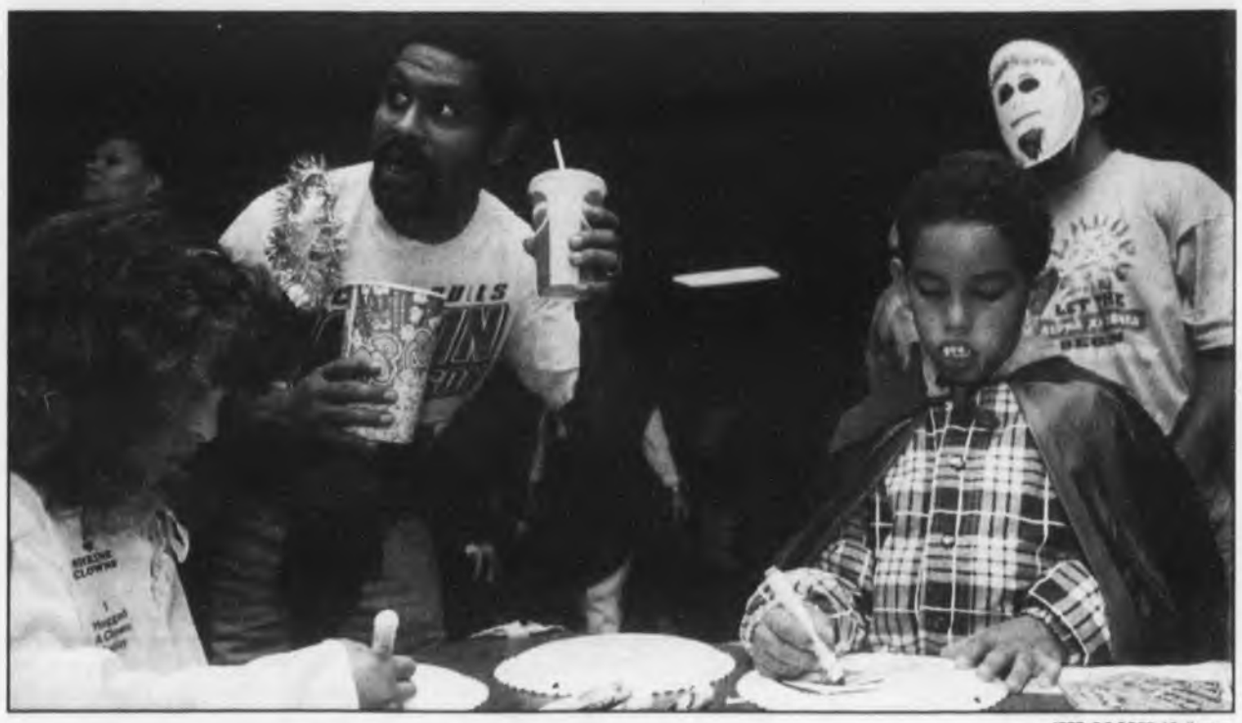
Fraternities and sororities sponsored Halloween activities for children before Fright Night II.

Thirty-five houses participated in the event, and some sponsored two tables. House members gave away candy, built a haunted maze and helped children color pumpkins. Children were also able to stick their hands in bags of make-believe eyeballs and intestines — bags of wet grapes and noodles.

The Interfraternity Council and the Panhellenic Council decided to sponsor the event when the Athletic Association asked for help.

"The Athletic Association contacted IFC and Panhellenic, asking if we could get the greek houses involved. So, we made it the fall all-greek philanthropy," Cade Keenan, IFC public relations director, said.

The organizations had been looking for a philanthropy for the fall and thought this would be a fun way to get involved with the community, said Lindsey Roy, Panhellenic Council's public relations director.



"We wanted to have a fall philanthropy in addition to the one in the spring to help give us another opportunity to serve the community. Plus it's a lot of fun," she said.

Not only were children dressed in costume, but so were most of the fraternity and sorority members.

"People are really in the spirit. It's so much fun to see everyone dressed up and all of the kids in their cute costumes," Michelle Weber, member of Chi Omega, said.

Dressed as an angel, Danniele Hickman of Manhattan said she loved the games and the candy.

Sandy Hickman, Danniele's mother, said she was happy about having someplace new to go trick-or-treating.

ISIAH GRAHAM, right, and his father, Edward Graham, work on a paper-plate mask at Alpha Tau Omega's table before Fright Night II on Thursday night at Bramlage Coliseum. Thirty-five houses participated in the event, and some sponsored two tables.

"I think it's a good thing. It provides entertainment for the kids, and you know it's safe. You don't have to worry about who's out there giving candy to the kids," she said.

The activities were fun for the fraternities and sororities and helped children increase their candy supply, Keenan said.

"I think everyone really got into it with the costumes and the festive atmosphere. I think the kids definitely benefited from all the extra candy," he said.

Jurors finally selected; Nichols' trial to begin Monday in Denver

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DENVER — Attorneys settled on 18 people Thursday as tentative selections for a jury in the Oklahoma City bombing trial. The judge planned to meet with them later Thursday to determine whether they are still eligible to serve.

In a brief hearing Thursday morning, attorneys for both sides excused 46 candidates, leaving their choices for the 12 jurors and six alternates.

"I intend to give them instructions," U.S. District Judge Richard Matsch said. "I'll reserve the administering of the oath until Monday morning."

The 18 were among 71 prospective jurors qualified to serve in the trial after 23 days of tedious, often personal questioning.

Opening statements are expected to begin Monday, more than 2 1/2 years after the April 19, 1995, explosion that killed 168 people and injured hundreds more. It was the deadliest terrorist act ever on U.S. soil.

Defense attorney Michael Tigar said Nichols has been actively helping with his defense but "would probably rather be working on a blueberry farm somewhere." Nichols displayed no expression through much of the jury selection.

Many prospective jurors clearly remembered the devastation caused by the blast. But while they knew a great deal about Timothy McVeigh, the 29-year-old Gulf War veteran convicted in the bombing and sentenced to death earlier this year, they said they knew virtually nothing about Nichols.

Prosecutors contend that Nichols, 42, played a key role in the bombing, robbing a gun dealer to finance the plot and joining McVeigh in building the device. The two Army buddies shared a hatred of the federal government, prosecutors say, and that led to the bombing in retaliation for the government's deadly raid on the Branch Davidian compound near Waco, Texas, exactly two years before the Oklahoma City blast.

The defense has argued that Nichols, a committed family man, knew nothing of the plot and wasn't even in Oklahoma City the day of the blast.

Nichols could be sentenced to death if convicted of murder, conspiracy and weapons counts. McVeigh was condemned to death after his conviction on identical charges in June. His appeal is pending.

Prosecutors have asked Matsch to ban Tigar from mentioning government misconduct allegations during his opening statement. They specified the FBI's refusal to allow a public defender to talk with Nichols after the bombing and questions about FBI lab work.

The government also opposes a defense motion asking that prosecutors be ordered to present testimony from bombing victims, victims' relatives and rescuers in an uninterrupted stretch.

Prosecutors gave gripping, often tearful testimony throughout McVeigh's trial.

Halloween celebrations should involve safety, responsibility, fun

Halloween — it's a time for people to get together and have a good, wholesome time.

Right?

Whether your plans include Baby Ruths and peanuts or just lots of cold beverages, we'd like to present you with a few tips that will make tonight more enjoyable for every goblin.

Believe it or not, real people with real families live here in Manhattan. Use extra caution when tooling around in your car tonight — rolling over a little ghost could cause more fright than anyone needs.

Think back to the days when you smeared your mom's make-up all over yourself and went trick-or-treating as a punk rocker. Remember the disappointment when someone gave you an apple or salt-water taffy? When the little scary creatures come a-ringing your doorbell, be sure to have plenty of yummy goodies on hand. If you don't have anything to give, be sure to turn off your porch light (where applicable). By the way, it's a real social faux paus to offer the kids cigarettes in lieu of candy.

If you're out and about tonight, don't ruin someone else's hard work by smashing defenseless jack-o-lanterns. It's something of a disturbing thing to do, and it could turn all those little happy clowns into sad ones.

Along those same lines, don't take advantage of this evening's festivities by using it as an excuse to vandalize something. Sure, it seems funny at the time, but it's really not in the true spirit of Halloween.

Just because you're an adult now doesn't mean you can't get all dressed up yourself. Though it probably wouldn't be a good idea to actually go trick-or-treating, it could be all sorts of fun to smear yourself with fake blood and collapse on the floor of your living room to fre ut your roommates.

No, it's not Christmas, but Halloween is a great opportunity to bask in the glow of mirth, merriment and carved pumpkins. It's up to all of us to ensure that tonight is a rip-roaring and safe Halloween.

Things to do in Manhattan on Halloween when you're lame

BRANDI HERTIG

Boo.

Heh heh. I sure hope that frightened you something terrible. It is, after all, the most important day of the year — Halloween. It's also time to face those hard facts.

We are just too damn old to go trick-or-treating.

Don't give me any of that whiny but-I'm-still-a-kid-inside malarkey. There's no reason for big people to be taking Snickers and salt-water taffy from little people.

So what do big people do on Halloween? Let's put everything out on the table right now and say this is a guide for people who meet the following guidelines:

• You don't work at some place that's throwing some Super Hero bash you're required to go to, where they won't let you in if your costume's lame, .

• You're not in a greek house or have access to neither alcohol nor friends.

• Your boyfriend/girlfriend decided going to South Dakota with the Speech Unlimited team would be a much better time than carving vegetables and throwing candy at flame-retardant children.

• One time your mom tried to be a Q-Tip for Halloween and suffered serious injury because she had 30 yards of cotton gauze wrapped around her ankles.

Now, I'm not saying that any or all of the above have anything to do with me, per se. Let's just say I'm in the know as far as activities for the ghoulishly challenged go.

Fun Idea No. 1: You'll need two (2) rolls of toilet paper, a bottle of Kiwi Shoe White shoe polish and something fleecy.

Relive Homecoming week with your roommate (provided said roommate(s) has met all of the aforementioned guidelines).

Go medieval on your car with the toilet paper, making it look as much like a float as you can. For that extra Rose Bowl appeal, get paper that either has little flowers on it or is a nice pastel hue.

Then paint indecipherable things all over every window of your car with the Kiwi Shoe White shoe polish. Make up your own greek alphabet. Who knows — maybe someone will see your real rad hoopty and ask to join your particular greek organization. Then next Halloween you'll have friends who will be forced to hang out with you.

Note: Be sure to draw a square around the driver's side portion of the windshield, then draw an arrow and write something like "boo" or "lame-ass person who has no friends."

Out of the fleecy something you have on hand, cut out a couple real slick jackets. Sew on patches bearing the letters of your new-found greek organization. Nothing says "Happy Halloween" better than a couple of people wearing matching jackets that say something like "Gamma Jamma Mamma on the Tip — Homecoming '97."

Fun Idea No. 2: You'll need one (1) stopwatch and one (1) car.

Park your car in an apartment complex parking lot that is not your own. Park your car in a manner that would prevent any through traffic from flowing in any normal manner. Take down how long it takes for the following to occur:

• An angry tenant comes down and asks you to move.

• When you become belligerent (and you should become so at this point), the angry tenant calls the landlord for advice.

• The time between when the landlord tells the tenant to call the police him/herself and the time the police actually arrive.

• The time between when the police say they can't do anything unless the landlord says so and the time the tenant spews a string of quite colorful expletives at you.

Stay put the whole night, because we know ol' Johnny Landlord's not going anywhere. Crank up the G-Love and Special Sauce to a level that will make the windows jar gently, but not so loud the tenants can file a complaint about you.

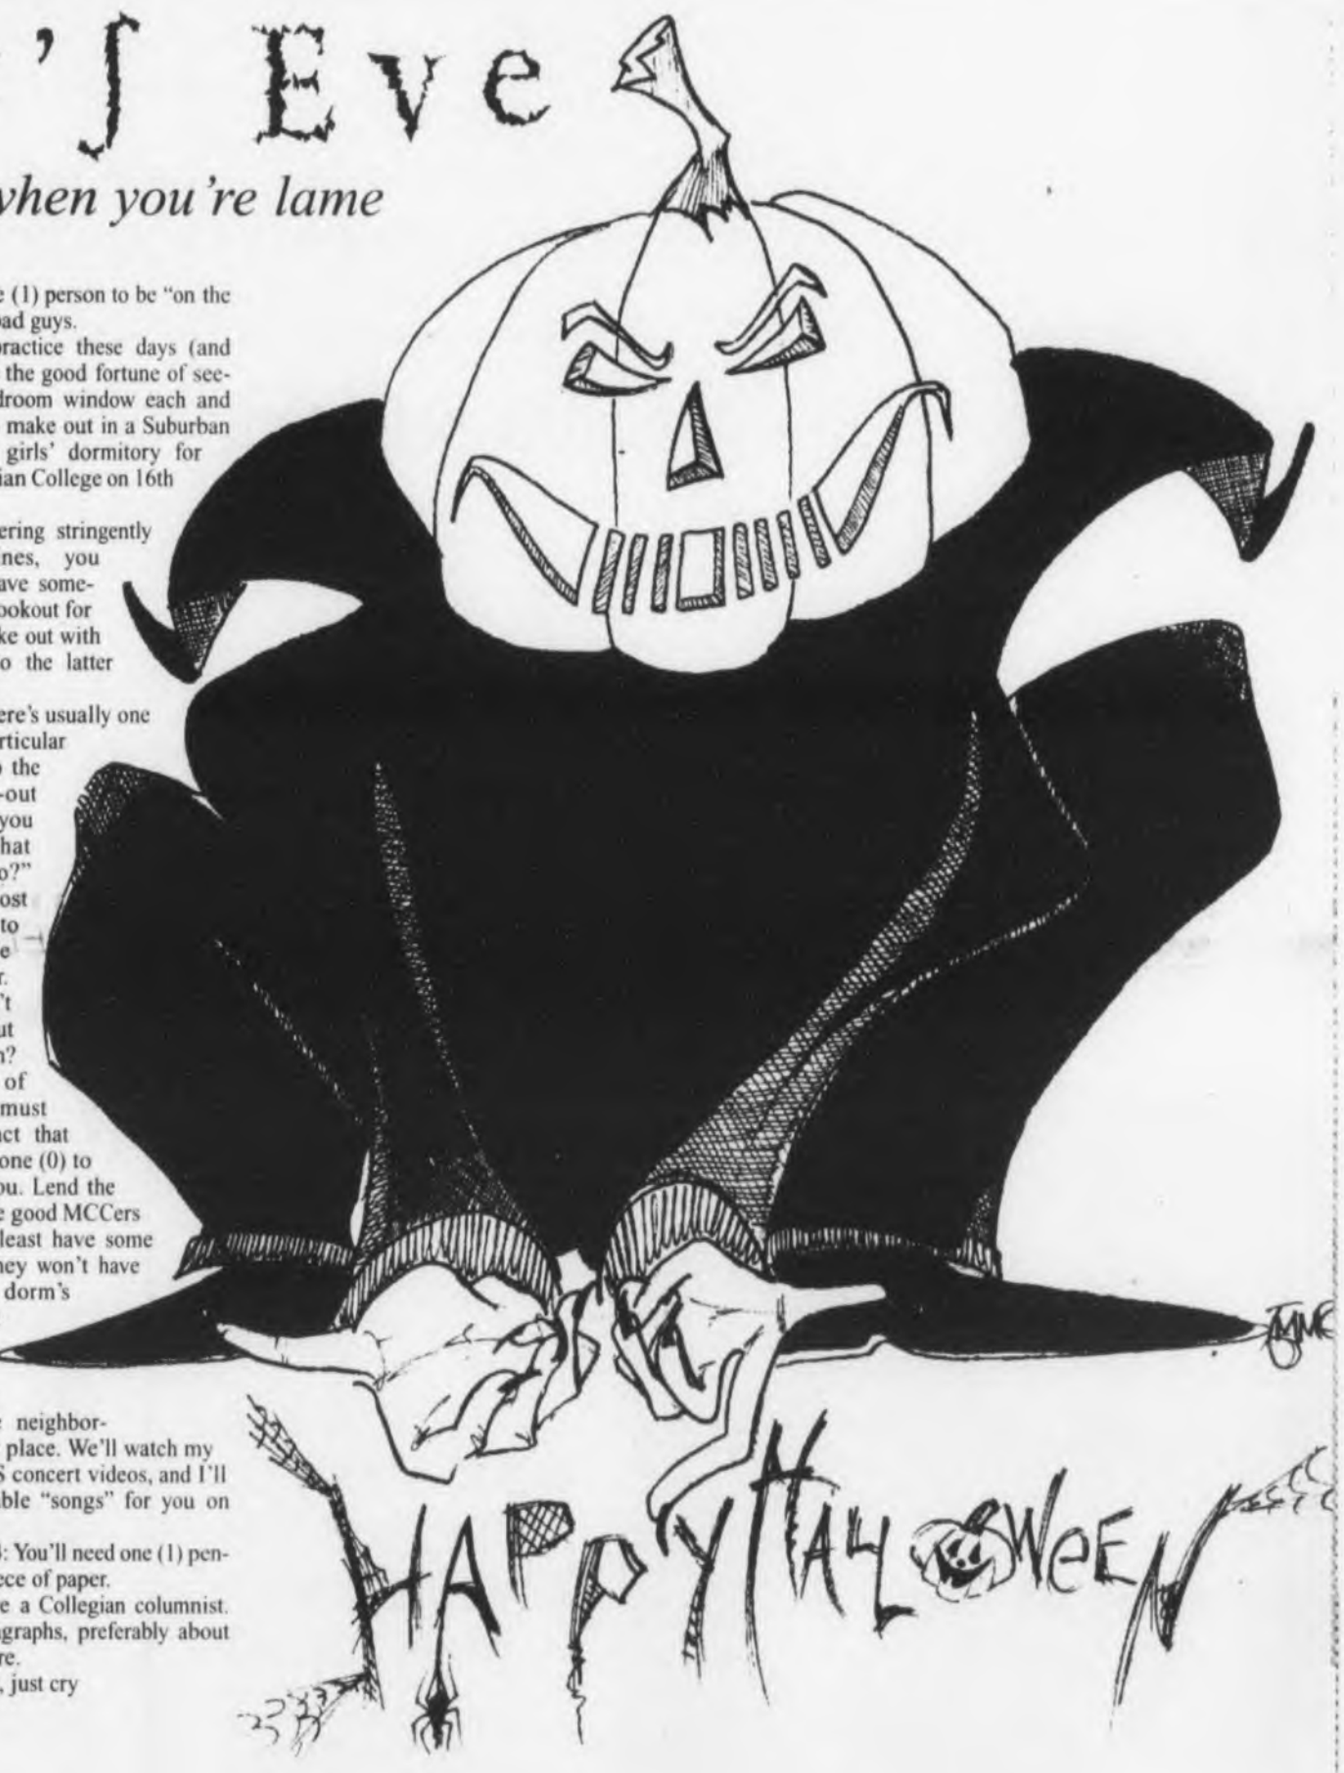
I recommend doing this one while also doing Fun Idea No. 1.

Fun Idea No. 3: You'll need one (1) Suburban and one (1) person to be "on the lookout" for the bad guys.

A common practice these days (and something I have the good fortune of seeing from my bedroom window each and every night) is to make out in a Suburban in front of the girls' dormitory for Manhattan Christian College on 16th Street.

If you're adhering stringently to the guidelines, you shouldn't even have someone to be on the lookout for you, let alone make out with you. We'll get to the latter problem in a bit.

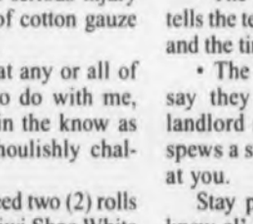
First of all, there's usually one girl from that particular dorm assigned to the nightly "make-out patrol" duty. If you slip her a "What Would Jesus Do?" bracelet, she'll most likely add you to the list of people to watch out for. After all, wouldn't Jesus help her out in such a situation?



With that out of the way, you must give into the fact that you will find no one (0) to make out with you. Lend the Suburban to some good MCCers and let them at least have some fun. That way, they won't have to sit on the dorm's stoop for the whole damn world to see.

And because you'll be in the neighborhood, stop by my place. We'll watch my roommate's INXS concert videos, and I'll play unrecognizable "songs" for you on my guitar.

Fun Idea No. 4: You'll need one (1) pencil and one (1) piece of paper.



Act like you're a Collegian columnist. Write a few paragraphs, preferably about God or architecture.

If all else fails, just cry

'No more mincemeat pie'

It's funny the things you remember when someone you love dies.

When I heard that cancer had claimed my first husband's mother Saturday morning, I thought of all the times we laughed and cried together in the past 18 years since I've been a part of the Johanning family.

One particular incident came to me immediately, and it made me chuckle.

When my husband was in the hospital in Wichita in early 1986, I stayed with his family in Haysville, Kan. We camped out at Jerome's bedside all day and returned to the Johanning home at night. One night, I was stopped at a stoplight, when all of a sudden Rita started laughing.

"What are you laughing at?" I asked.

"That guy just mooned me!" she said. "If he knew I'm old enough to be his grandmother, he wouldn't have done that!"

That was one of the few light moments during Jerome's hospital stay and the long days after his death. But it made us laugh whenever we recalled it. And now, I find myself recalling so many things about Rita that I loved and admired.

I first met Rita and Ken Johanning just a few days before their son and I were married in September 1979. Jerome - Jerry, to his family and friends back home - and I had met in Costa Rica. We always thought it was ironic that we had lived only 50-some miles apart all our lives, but first met when we were both so far from our homes.

I remember writing Rita and Ken before Jerome and I came home prior to our marriage. I was wondering what to call them. "Mr. and Mrs. Johanning certainly is too formal," I said in the letter. "The names Ken and Rita have a nice ring to them, but calling you by your first names seems a bit too informal. Mom and Dad are my own parents, so I think Mom and Dad J would be a good compromise."

My folks and Mom and Dad J were real troopers to help Jerome and me plan the details of our wedding. Their working together while Jerome and I were still in Costa Rica formed a bond that lasted. The Johannings and my parents became fast friends, comparing notes through the years and, I'm sure, shaking their heads, at what they considered to be some of the foolish decisions we made.

The Johanning family made me feel right at home after I married Jerome. Mom and Dad J came to visit us while we still were living in Costa Rica. One day we rode into the mountains and I discovered that Mom J did not like heights at all.

As we crawled along the narrow, winding, unprotected road, her hand was constantly on my knee, trying to pull us closer to the mountain. Later, she often referred to that trip as the time when we became "very well acquainted."

Mom J always enjoyed her extended family, but she particularly enjoyed time alone with her sons, whether it was shopping for Christmas presents or drinking coffee or just chatting about this and that. One such opportunity occurred by chance when I decided to go to Burns, Kan. for the weekend on my own.

Mom and Dad J, who had intended to surprise the both of us with a visit, went on to Manhattan anyway and really enjoyed having their son to themselves that weekend. The recollection of that incident was later an endless source of amusement.

Mom J was an excellent cook. My second husband, Art, requested and received her homemade mincemeat pie for a Christmas present the past two years. One of Art's first comments upon hearing about Mom J's death, was, "No more mincemeat pie."

When I married Art, the Johannings welcomed him into the family. Not every family would have been as open and loving as they were when their daughter-in-law remarried, but that's just another aspect of the Johanning family I love.

Another thing I love about Mom and Dad J is their affection for children. I was three and a half months pregnant with Mariya when Jerome died. Mom and Dad J were always supportive, always there if I needed a hand. They, along with my parents, Jerome's brother, my sister and a couple of friends, were in the delivery room right after Mariya was born.

Mom and Dad J were overjoyed and overwhelmed with grief at the same time - the same joy and grief I felt at the thought that my husband and their son wasn't there to savor the moment of our daughter's birth.

They were right there when Mariya was just a few weeks old, and I was so exhausted from caring for a newborn I thought I might collapse.

Mariya got more rocking time than most babies do because Mom and Dad J couldn't bear to let her so much as squeak without picking her up.

Through the years, Mom and Dad J have been loving, doting grandparents, both to Mariya and later on, to Art's and my daughter Katie. They often said that Katie made an even dozen grandchildren for them. They showered all their grandchildren with love and affection, and spoiled them in the classic grandparent way - giving them candy before meals, $2 bills for Valentine's Day and giving them wonderful gifts such as the dolls Mom J had sewn with lace, ribbons and tiny buttons.

Perhaps most important, both Mom and Dad J took the time to talk with and teach things to Mariya and Katie.

At the beginning of 1997 when I was in the hospital for 11 weeks, Mom J came to visit. She later came and stayed at our home to help out while I was regaining my strength. Late in the school year, she and Dad J were there, along with my parents and Art's mom, when we attended Mariya's grade-school band concert.

We saw Mom J for the last time on Labor Day weekend. She had warned us ahead of time she had lost her hair from the chemotherapy treatments. Art, being the blunt person he is and not wanting Katie to be startled by Mom J's loss of hair, told Katie we were going to see "bald-headed grandma." Mariya and I looked at each other and rolled our eyes. Yet somehow, that comment made Katie less afraid, and she went right to Grandma when she saw her.

And now, Mom J is going to rest beside her son and her parents in a small country cemetery.

I'm going to miss you, Mom J. In fact, I'd like to call you right now to tell you that over a cup of coffee.

Rest in peace . . . and give Jerome our love.

Reform party to open convention; Perot to give KC keynote address

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Political activists from around the nation will gather in Kansas City, Mo., this weekend for what is being billed as the founding convention of the Reform Party — the party established by Ross Perot.

Between 400 and 600 voting delegates are supposed to approve a party constitution, draft a platform and elect officers. Perot is scheduled to give the keynote address Saturday night.

The Reform Party wants to sort out its future, with one key question being the role for its founder. Questions about Perot's involvement created a dissident movement that formed its own organization.

Linda Diehl, a radio saleswoman from Abilene, Kan., a former Republican who likes Perot's message, plans to begin the 170-mile drive to Kansas City as soon as she ends her work week. Like other delegates attending this weekend, she hopes to gain new enthusiasm for her volunteer political work.

"We get tired," she said. "But, boy, we go to one of these things, and Ross gets up there and goes to town, and we get excited."

Participants said the purpose of the convention is to do the work necessary to make the Reform Party a strong national organization.

Committee meetings begin Friday afternoon, and the full convention convenes Saturday morning. Delegates plan to debate and approve a party platform that afternoon.

They also are scheduled to hear a speech from Harry Wu, a human rights activist and former Chinese prisoner.

But the big event is Perot's speech, which follows an address by Pat Choate, Perot's presidential running mate in 1996. Perot could talk about his political plans, but some delegates want him to talk about issues and give them encouragement.

"I think they need a recognition of how hard they work," Ida True Terry, an Overland Park, Kan., party activist, said.

Reform Party activists hope the convention will create interest in the organization and its platform and attract people who do not vote.

"The more people we get involved at the county and township level, the better off we'll be," Raejean Overholtzer, treasurer of the Missouri party, said.

One issue is the continued perception that Perot is directing the party's operations.

In early October, delegates from 23 states, former Reform Party activists, met in Schaumburg, Ill., to form the American Reform Party. Many members like Perot's message but believe he and close aides have too much power in the party meeting in Kansas City.

Linda Witherspoon, a Nashville physician and chairwoman of the American Reform Party, said the fact that Perot is giving the keynote address is telling.

"That's an indication, isn't it, that it's a Perot-centered party," she said. "There's a problem with credibility. The American people are wise enough to recognize it."

But Kansas City delegates dispute the notion that Perot or his aides control the party. They said the party is being built by volunteers and that Perot, the billionaire Texas business executive who ran for president in 1992 and 1996, is merely its spokesman.

Technology invades privacy

JOHN HENDERSON
staff writer

Privacy is much more complicated than it used to be.

Databases of personal information including phone numbers, addresses and social security numbers are created and used by business and government agencies, often without the subjects of the databases ever knowing their privacy might be violated.

"You can take comfort in this," said George Trubow, director of the Center for Information Technology and Privacy Law. "They're only interested in two things; how you vote and what you buy. The rest is up to you."

Trubow is the editor of a three-volume treatise, "Privacy Law and Practice," released in 1987. He also co-authored "Privacy: Cases and Materials," published in 1992.

Virgil Wallentine, head of the K-State department of computer science, introduced Trubow as the first speaker the department plans to sponsor on the subject of "Ethics in Computing." Future speakers will be introduced annually.

Wallentine said when he was a student one of the ways he and other students proved their abilities was to break into a computer system. They would poke around without doing any serious damage and present their professors with proof they had broken in.

"You showed the prof how smart you were," he said.

Trubow said now so much personal information is contained on computers and distributed through networks, practitioners have to take their jobs much more seriously, with regard to the privacy of the people that information references.

"This digital electronic environment is unlike anything else we have come across in human history," he said. "There is no way I believe I can overemphasize the impact it has on our lives."

Trubow said decisions have to be made about how we use new technologies, and those decisions will ultimately define who we are.

"If technology does nothing to improve the quality of life," he said, "then we don't need it."

The government and banks like network technology, Trubow said. It allows for a cashless and checkless society. Instead of paying with cash that is expensive to be minted, a debit card can transfer currency in an instant.

Checks "float," or make a purchase days before a deposit is made, thereby purchasing with the bank's money without paying interest, he said. Banks don't have to deal with float anymore; they just issue a debit card.

Some of the ways that some groups may use technology to better themselves might not be so great for individuals, he said. The wealth of personal information can be used to virtually predict what any member of society wants and needs, and what means a person will use to get them.

"These folks can learn to program you just as you program a computer," he said.

Trubow said he received a discount card for a tune-up from a dealership he bought his car from. He realized what was happening while calling up the dealership to schedule an appointment.

The database remembered when he bought the car and sent the mail to him, even though he said he hadn't thought about having his car serviced.

"Was the decision I made one of free will?" Trubow said. "Defensively, I say, 'Yes.' But I wonder."

He told a story about a man who had filed a civil suit for theft of identity. Someone on the east coast claiming to be

FRIGHT NIGHT WITH DICKIE V

Vitale entertains thousands, plugs K-State basketball teams

SUN DEE MILLS
sports editor

Although Halloween was a day away, Wildcat basketball fans donned their best costumes to attend Fright Night II.

The doors to Bramlage Coliseum opened to trick-or-treaters at 6:30 p.m. Thursday, and the first 1,000 fans got T-shirts that read "Fright Night with Dickie V."

Dick Vitale, the bald man with the big voice, was the Cats' special guest host for the evening. But Vitale was just one attraction among two hours of sports entertainment.

After the lights in Bramlage dimmed, strobe lighting introduced the Classy Cats in ghostly, glow-in-the-dark masks. Willie the Wildcat, joined by senior guard Brit Jacobson and sophomore transfer guard Duane Davis, led the Classy Cats as they danced to "Men In Black."

Jacobson pulled a quick change as the women's team entered the court. As the "Mission: Impossible" theme played, the team surrounded a group wearing opposing fan clothing and "shot" them. Then, team members shed their matching Cat jackets and danced to "Space Jam."

"ANY TEAM THAT CAN PLAY THAT TEAM IN LAWRENCE AS CLOSE AS THEY DID DOWN TO THE BUZZER CAN BEAT ANYONE IN AMERICA."
DICK VITALE, ESPN ANALYST

To give the women a chance to change and breathe, the K-State pep band accompanied the Classy Cats and the cheerleaders, who were dressed in army gear. The pep squads got the crowd pumped up for Wildcat Radio Network's Greg Sharpe, who introduced ESPN college basketball analyst Dick Vitale.

Vitale said he was impressed with Bramlage, a "Rolls Royce" of basketball arenas, and the Wildcat basketball programs. He commended the women's team for last year's NCAA Tournament appearance and predicted good things to come for the men's team.

"Any team that can play that team in Lawrence as close as they did down to the buzzer can beat anyone in America," Vitale said.

Vitale started his day Thursday in Sarasota, Fla. From there, he flew to Atlanta into Kansas City and

It's only rock 'n' roll

Rolling Stones build bridges to Norman, Okla.

REVIEW BY KEVIN KLASSEN • PHOTOS COURTESY OF WWW.STONESWORLD.COM

Oklahoma was belted with another blow-out Tuesday night. This time it wasn't a football defeat at the hands of the Wildcats. The members of the Rolling Stones continued their tradition of performing world-class, keep-ya-reeling-till-ya-drop rock 'n' roll at the University of Oklahoma's packed Memorial Stadium.

Music Review

Forget for a moment that the Stones have been together for 35 years. Forget that this tour, supporting the band's latest album "Bridges to Babylon," is sponsored by Sprint, the mega-corporation turning greater metropolitan Kansas City into its own private office complex. Forget that the Stones have already made enough money to give John Denver a Rocky Mountain high for the rest of eternity.

A tall order, to be sure. Despite all this, plus the years of band bickering, arrests, deaths and intrusive femme fatales (or maybe because of these things), a live Rolling Stones performance imparts one thing to even the most cynical of rock 'n' roll fans. The Rolling Stones are one of the best bands of all time.

With all the original band members in their 50s, one might expect the Stones' live show to become a bit sluggish, maybe even slightly tame. Even though it might be your father's long-haired hippie band, the Stones have forgotten more about stage presence and in-the-back-seat-past-10-on-a-school-night bump and grind than most bands will ever learn.

(By the way, Sheryl Crow opened. But enough about her.)

The playlist has been shaken up this time out. "Satisfaction" has been bumped to the lead song, followed with "It's Only Rock 'N' Roll (But I Like It)" and "Let's Spend the Night Together." Many bands get rutted by playing the same songs on tour. These guys have played these songs for decades and still seem genuinely ecstatic to be performing — even in Oklahoma.

The first set of the two-hour, 10-minute concert was peppered with a few surprises for Stone-cold fanatics. The crowd was treated to "Sister Morphine" from 1971's "Sticky Fingers" and "19th Nervous Breakdown."

"Bridges to Babylon" was represented with "Flip the Switch," "Out of Control" and "Has Anybody Seen My Baby" with the gritty, oh-please-MTV-play-me video projected on the gigantic screen hanging over the stage. But the highlight of the first set was "Gimme Shelter" from "Let It Bleed." Mick Jagger and back-up singer Lisa Fisher oozed sexual tension as Fisher wailed her solo.

The concert turned interactive as Jagger called for the Stones' Internet page to be called up on the video screen. Concert-goers were able to vote on the home page for songs they'd like to hear. Tuesday night's winner was a inspired rendition of "Shine A Light" from "Exile On Main Street" — even though lead guitarist Ron Wood fumbled a bit through the solo.

"Miss You," the late-1970s attempt at a disco hit, turned into an arena-sized campfire sing-a-long after Jagger urged the crowd to sing "so loud they'll be able to hear you down in Texas."

The first set finished with Keith Richards' obligatory lead vocal performance. This time, however, Richards' didn't go with the much-expected "Happy." Instead, he sang "All About You" from "Emotional Rescue," a great song with a soulful, Sinatra-esque intro that was a testament to how much Richards' voice has improved since the band's last tour.

The Stones' trademark stage apparatus was in full swing. Gargantuan inflatable dolls and laser lights were the order of the evening, and before the second set, a large metal bridge extended itself from the center of the main stage to a raised dais in the middle of the floor audience. There, the band performed Chuck Berry's "Little Queenie," "The Last Time" and "You Got Me Rocking" from 1994's "Voodoo Lounge."

Their Satanic Majesties made their way back to the main stage, sweeping through the throng of fans that security parted like the Red Sea, to perform "Sympathy for the Devil" and "Tumbling Dice." This was followed with possibly one of the best live versions of "Honkey Tonk Women" I've ever heard — even the cow bell could be distinctly heard throughout the stadium. Jagger donned a Stetson as he sang about troubling, alcohol-induced relationships. Note to Garth Brooks: There's a new sheriff in Oklahoma.

"Start Me Up" and "Jumpin' Jack Flash" finished up the high-energy second set, and the Stones encored with "Brown Sugar" while the audience was pelted with confetti and Roman candle blasts.

The back-up entourage seemed to be scaled back on the "Bridges" tour from the small on-stage army of the "Steel Wheels" and "Voodoo Lounge" tours. Singers Bernard Fowler and Fisher handled the back-up duties superbly, and the horn sections were fiercely led by long-time auxiliary Stone Bobby Keys on saxophone. This is the guy who used to help Richards fling televisions out of hotel windows. New Stone Darryl Jones handled the low-end noise thankfully replacing bassist Bill Wyman who overstayed his tenure with the band. Charlie Watts was as stoic and steady as ever on drums.

Even after 35 years, the Stones are still down and dirty enough to claw their way out of the crater of the corporate image that invariably becomes attached to any searing talent that has the staying power to endure — like Walt Disney dousing himself in cartoon ink and dancing naked on top of the Space Mountain ride. Jagger, Richards, Wood and Watts still perform with enough wit, energy and sleaze to put shame to any of today's "cutting-edge" bands.

Besides, Jagger wasn't ashamed to razz the Oklahoma fans about the score of OU's game with the Wildcats.

"What's this I hear about you guys only scoring seven points?" he asked the crowd. "I thought you could do better than that."

Jagger once said in an interview he didn't want to end up still singing "Satisfaction" when he is in his 50s. Well, Mick, the full house at Norman is proof positive that there's still a demand for the Rolling Stones' brand of unfettered, shameless entertainment.

It might be only rock 'n' roll.

But we like it.

Virgins to be auctioned off at 'Rocky Horror' showing

JOHN FRANSON
staff writer

You scoffed at the trite exhibitionism at Lollapalooza.

You laughed at the people wearing Darth Vader and Princess Leia costumes opening night of the "Star Wars" re-release.

You want the real thing. You want exhibitionism.

"The Rocky Horror Picture Show" is for you.

Even if you've never heard of dancing the Time Warp, you might find yourself doing just that when Union Program Council presents the annual Halloween showing of the cult classic at midnight Friday and Saturday in the Union Ballroom.

Featuring such stars as Susan Sarandon, Tim Curry and Meatloaf, the movie centers around a wholesome couple who end up stranded at the castle of Dr. Frank N. Furter, a transvestite mad scientist. All manner of bizarre song-and-dance hijinks ensue.

"The movie itself isn't very good, as far as plot, but it's meant to be an audience-participation movie," Heide McBride, UPC program adviser, said.

Audiences get into the movie in various ways: dressing as characters from the movie, acting out scenes and shouting out lines and using props during key scenes. Audience participation scripts can even be found on the Internet, but McBride, who has seen the movie five times, said not to follow the scripts too closely.

"Don't memorize it. You'll learn more by going and actually hearing what that particular audience says. And don't say every line, because you'll lose your voice."

Props include toilet paper, water guns, rice, newspapers, toast and playing cards. Prop bags will be sold at the show for 50 cents, but participants may bring their own. Some items, such as cottage cheese, are not allowed.

"It's just too messy for us to clean up," McBride said. Supersoaker water guns are allowed but cannot be filled more than halfway.

Festivities will start about 10:30 p.m. Audience members who haven't seen the movie before are called "virgins," and they will go up on stage to be "auctioned" off to the crowd. Mary Renee Smith, sophomore in speech will act as master of ceremonies for the event.

"Last year somebody bet their shoes, or bet the person next to them, or bet a gallon of paint, or six tickets from Parking Services — it's a very fun way to start the crowd," Smith said.

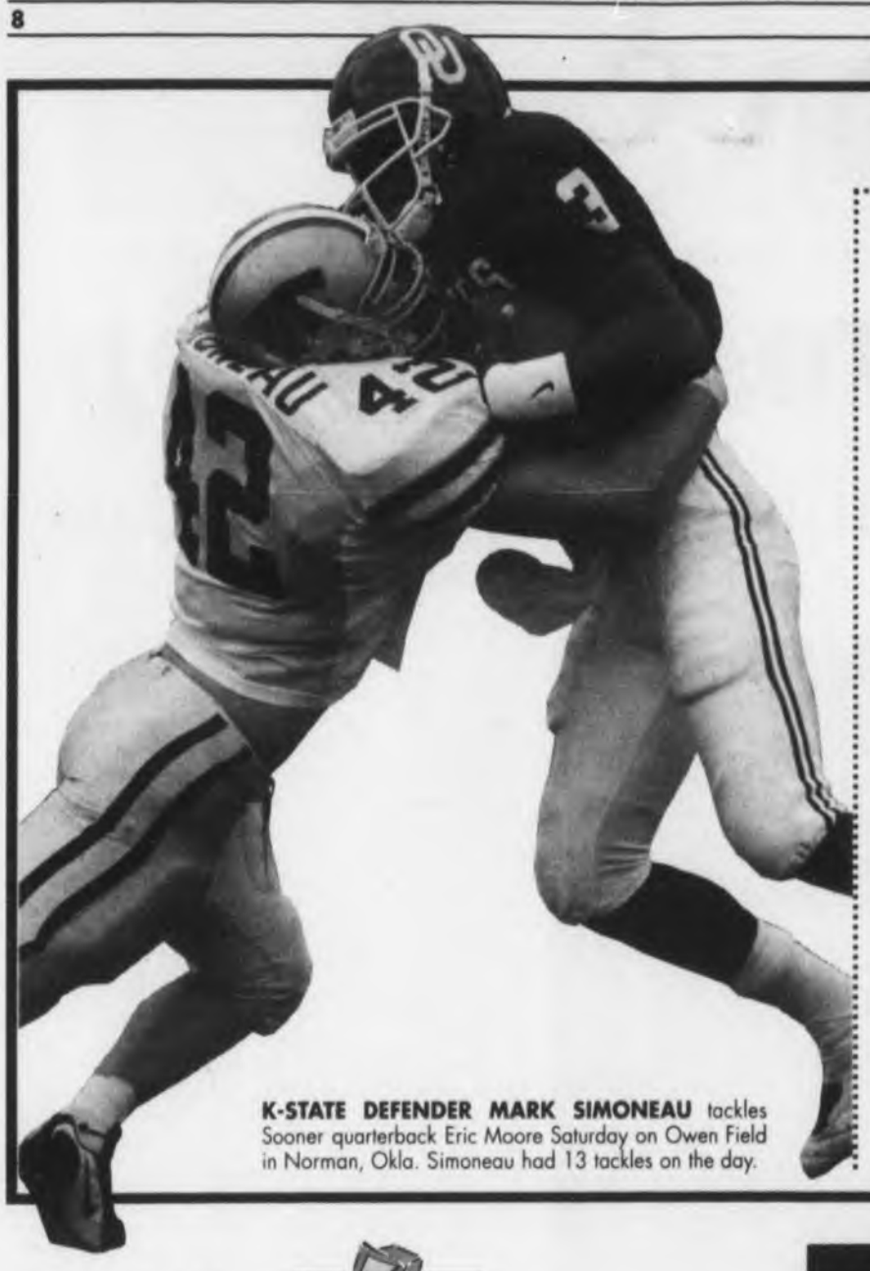
A contest before the movie will determine the best costumes through audience response.

"It's really just kind of an impromptu sort of spur-of-the-moment kind of thing, so we're not really sure what's going to happen," Smith said. But not everything is improvised.

"We've got a few surprises planned," she said.

McBride said 300 to 400 people have attended each showing in previous years, and she said she expects the same this year. She offers some advice to "Rocky Horror" newcomers:

"Relax and have fun," she said. "Don't be shocked at some of the things you see."



And finally, "Wear clothes that you're not afraid to get wet."

DOWN IN TEXAS

Cats travel to Texas Tech remembering tiring game from 1 year ago

In a 26-7 victory over Oklahoma last weekend, the Wildcat football team has reached eligibility for its fifth bowl appearance in five years. This statistic still doesn't make Coach Bill Snyder comfortable with the Cats' 6-1 record.

"You never know what's going to happen down the road," Snyder said. "It's a very competitive conference. If you don't have something in your pocket, it's not good."

What Snyder and the Cats have in their pocket are six wins, three non-conference wins against Mid-American Conference teams and three versus Big 12 opponents.

Texas Tech, the Cats' upcoming opponent, is now tied with Oklahoma State for first in the Big 12 South. The emotional level in this contest will be high on both sides, offensive lineman Todd Weiner said.

"This is a big game," he said. "We have to forget about the week before and we can't think about the week after. This is the biggest game."

Not that the Cats don't have big-game experience. Besides the four bowl games, Snyder gained one of the biggest victories he's had at K-State when the Cats dominated then-No. 14 Texas A&M 36-17 on Oct. 18.

But for some Cats, dreams of bowl appearances are already dancing in their heads.

"We're not looking for any bowl game," senior running back Eric Hickson said. "We want that Jan. 1 bowl game."

Hickson admitted before that dream can become reality, the Cats must deal with Texas Tech.

"This week, we're concentrating on Texas Tech," Hickson said. "They stuck in the game and gave us problems last year."

In last year's Big 12 inaugural game in Manhattan, the Cats had a comfortable 21-3 lead over the Red Raiders when then-senior strong safety Mario Smith recovered a bad snap in the end zone for a touchdown.

Tech had one last chance for a game-tying touchdown in the final moments of the game, but Smith and sophomore free safety Lamar Chapman broke up a fourth-down pass to Red Raider wide receiver Donnie Hart inside the K-State five-yard line to prevent the tie. The Cats came out with an exhausting 21-14 victory.

"That Texas Tech game last year was a very long game," junior linebacker Travis Ochs said. "I think we took something like 103 snaps on defense, 48 in the fourth alone. It was very tiring."

The Cats' defense last year was dealing with the Texas Tech tandem of quarterback Zebbie Lethridge and running back Byron Hanspard. Hanspard ran for 115 yards and Lethridge completed 16 of 47 passes for 190 yards.

Because Hanspard opted for the NFL draft, Lethridge is working harder at passing the ball. Snyder said Lethridge's improvements are troublesome.

"Zebbie's throwing the ball very well," he said. "He's increased his percentages in throwing."

Lethridge also has the athletic ability to run the ball. Against Southwestern Louisiana earlier this season, Lethridge got his highest number of rushes thus far, with 88 yards on 8 attempts.

"Zebbie and Corby (Jones, Missouri quarterback) are similar," Snyder said. "He's as similar to Michael (Bishop, Cat quarterback) as we've seen so far."

In that case, doesn't the Cat defense practice against a "Zebbie" every day? Snyder said that wasn't going to help too much.

"If anything, I think it could help their defense more than ours," Snyder said. "Our defense has only worked against Michael on several occasions this season. They've worked against Zebbie all spring and all last year."

Practicing against Bishop also has a drawback, Ochs said — the tackling thing.

"We don't have to tackle Bishop," Ochs said. "We just have to run up and touch him and it counts, but we'll have to tackle Zebbie. He's one of the most versatile quarterbacks in the league."

CLASSIFIED AD WRITING TIPS
- List items or services first. Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.
- Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.
- Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

Look at These Great New Army Offers

- $40,000 for College

When you enlist and become eligible for a certain skill, you could qualify for the Montgomery G.I. Bill plus the Army College Fund. That means you could earn up to $40,000 for college during a four year enlistment.

- $65,000 in Student Loans Repaid

If you're stuck with a student loan that's not in default, the Army might pay it off – up to $65,000! If you qualify, we'll reduce your debt by 1/3rd for each year you serve.

- $12,000 Cash Bonuses

If you qualify and volunteer to serve in one of the Army's top-priority occupational skills, you could receive a cash bonus of up to $12,000!

Find out more about these and other Army benefits. Talk to your local Army recruiter today.

HALLOWEEN

Student Union has been busy with activities all week and has more planned for the weekend.

Today and Saturday, the Union Program Council will feature "The Rocky Horror Picture Show," beginning at midnight in the Union Ballroom, Jessica Bigger, UPC member, said.

"The Union has always had events like these for Halloween, and 'The Rocky Horror Picture Show' has been around forever," she said.

Whether you go to haunted houses in Manhattan or the movies tonight, you can do your last-minute Halloween shopping at one of the costume shops around town.

"For college students, the most popular costume is the mask from 'Scream,'" said Kasey Brown, employee at the Halloween Boutique in Manhattan Town Center.

Winnie the Pooh, Elmo and Darth Vader are the most popular costumes among younger trick-or-treaters, Brown said.

"For parties, couples are looking for costumes that they can wear together so they can match," Brown said. "A popular combination is a vampire couple, which the girls like. But the guys still like the 'Scream' mask the best."

With movies, parties or good old-fashioned trick-or-treating, you're never too old to enjoy Halloween.

"I think dressing up is an opportunity for people at this age to spend one night as something they want to be," Trisha Langford, senior in public relations, said. "We get in such a rut in our schedules. It's fun just to let loose and imagine."

drove to Manhattan with men's coach Tom Asbury.

"It's not an easy place to get to, but I had a great time speaking to the team about having a sense of pride and wearing the uniform, believing in themselves and trying to build off the positive things from last season," Vitale said, referring to the 62-59 nail-biting KU-K-State game Jan. 4 at Bramlage.

Vitale was scheduled to speak at a dinner at 6 p.m., but he was late to the dinner because he spoke to the men's team for 30 minutes beforehand.

"I never asked our guys, but probably half of them didn't care for him before this," Asbury said. "After that, all of them respect him a great deal."

Vitale spoke for an hour at the dinner, with the proceeds from the ticket sales going to the Mike Ahearn Scholarship Fund.

The men's team's skit, a take-off on the TV game show "Family Feud," followed, but Chad Lindsley, sophomore in secondary education, said nothing could top Vitale.

"It kept us entertained, and it was fairly exciting," Lindsley said. "I liked the (skits) from last year better, but I liked Vitale the most of all."

The women's scrimmage consisted of two five-minute halves, and Lindsley said he was impressed with the way they played.

"I thought the girls looked awesome," Lindsley said.

Jason Stucky, freshman in business, agreed, commenting on the performance of freshman guard Kim Woodlee, No. 21.

"I was real impressed with the girls' scrimmage," Stucky said. "They seemed to be running plays well. No. 21's outside shooting really impressed me. That will help them out a lot."

Woodlee led the white team's scoring with eight points, and Jacobson led the purple team with nine.

The men's team followed with a 15-minute session. Lindsley said he liked what he saw.

"It was great that all the guys were getting a chance to play," Lindsley said. "The new faces impressed me."

Stucky mentioned Adam Lopez and Duane Davis as players to watch.

"Duane looks quick. He can handle the ball," he said. "He looks like he can give point guards trouble on defense as well."

Stucky said Vitale's presence was an attempt to vitalize interest from last year's disappointing season.

"They're having a rebuilding year," Stucky said. "But with people like Davis and Adam Lopez, they've got a chance to surprise some people. Vitale's being here won't be the highlight of their year."

SENATE

"That makes us an elitist organization as far as I'm concerned," Abbott said. "I feel like when not everyone is given the chance to gain the great experiences that I have had in student government, then that is elitist."

But others, who supported the resolution, said higher student fees as a result of higher salaries could also be considered elitist.

"When we come before this body and make an argument that students deserve more money, we also need to keep in mind those individuals ... who don't have the financial income to attend a college," Governmental Relations Committee Chair Patrick Carney said. "We go to the capital and we fight for them, but then we come back here, and we raise our privilege fee."

Coordinator of Student Activities Gayle Spencer said the salary increase could be taken from a surplus in this year's budget without a privilege-fee increase.

But Student Senate Intern Coordinator Kim Peschka, a member of the Privilege Fee Committee and author of the resolution, said salary raises could lead to higher fees in the future.

"We say we're going to take this funding from the salary savings that we have right now in the (Office of Student Activities and Services) budget. Right now that works great. Sure, let's pull a couple thousand dollars out there and give it to our student leadership," Peschka said.

"But what are we going to do in a couple of years when we don't have that extra money floating around?" she asked.

The committee will re-evaluate its recommendations and submit a new proposal to Senate.

him ran up huge bills in the first man's name.

The second man had obtained a birth certificate, driver's license and a Social Security card. Trubow met the first man after the two went to court.

"He said to me, 'Professor, it gave me the chills to see that man look at me and say, "Prove that I'm not who I say I am,"'" Trubow said.

He argued that databases are all right, as long as individuals are informed about them. He said people must enforce their views as individuals about how their personal information is used if privacy is to survive as a concept, although it's increasingly hard to keep up.

"Technology must not be treated as a toy," he said.

Maarten Vanswaay, who created the now-required ethics class for the computer science department, agreed with Trubow.

"We all have to speak up for ourselves," he said.

Iraq refuses to admit 3 American inspectors

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Iraq barred three American weapons experts from entering the country Sunday, the second such refusal in a week and the latest sign that Baghdad has no intention of backing down from its threat to expel American inspectors.

The experts arrived on a U.N. flight from Bahrain in advance of the scheduled resumption of U.N. inspections today, foreign diplomats said on condition of anonymity.

But they were turned back in a polite manner at Habbaniya, the military airport 40 miles west of Baghdad, the diplomats said.

The diplomats said inspectors from other countries were admitted, but gave no details.

The three Americans tried to go to Baghdad Thursday, the diplomats said.

On Wednesday, Iraq gave the 10 American weapons inspectors in Baghdad a week to leave the country. The order applied only to members of the U.N. disarmament commission.

The next day, Iraq refused to allow two American weapons inspectors to enter the country. Both work with the U.N. Special Commission, which oversees the elimination of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction. A third American, who works with the International Atomic Energy Agency, could have entered but returned to Bahrain with the other two.

Officials at the U.N. Special Commission in Baghdad declined to comment Sunday, and those in the Bahraini capital of Manama said they had no information.

There also was no comment from the Iraqi government.

Washington has not ruled out military action against Iraq.

Assistant Secretary of State Martin Indyk said Sunday in Saudi Arabia that Iraqi President Saddam Hussein must reverse his decision not to cooperate with the U.N. inspectors. Saudi Arabia, where 5,000 U.S. servicemen are stationed, is Washington's closest ally in the Persian Gulf.

The top four leaders in the U.S. Congress also stressed that the United States should respond quickly to Iraq, including military action.

House Democratic Leader Dick Gephardt, Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott, Senate Democratic Leader Tom Daschle and House Speaker Newt Gingrich, appearing on NBC's "Meet the Press," said they were united in the need to make Iraq back down.

But the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, Bill Richardson, said it is the United Nations, not the United States, that must confront the Iraqis.

"This is not a fight between the United States and Iraq. This is Iraq confronting the United Nations and (U.N.) Security Council violations," Richardson said on ABC's "This Week."

Chief U.N. weapons inspector Richard Butler of Australia suspended operations in Iraq last week just after the Iraqi announcement. But on Friday, Butler directed his team, including the Americans, to resume inspections on Monday.

There was no indication Iraq would try to stop those inspections, because the expulsion order does not take effect until Wednesday.

The inspectors must verify that Iraq has eliminated all weapons of mass destruction and the programs to build them before the U.N. Security Council will lift sanctions imposed after Iraq's 1990 invasion of Kuwait.

Iraq claims it has destroyed its long-range missiles and biological, chemical and nuclear weapons. But the commission told the Security Council in October that Iraq was withholding information.

The U.N. Security Council has warned Iraq of serious consequences if it sticks to its decision. But already, Russia a Security Council member, has urged that no military action be taken against Iraq.

Professional dancers, caterer bring new touches to annual celebration

Students and members of the Manhattan community celebrated the food, music and dances of the Indian culture at India Night on Sunday.

Indira Reddy, India Student Association president, said the organization has sponsored India Night at K-State for more than 15 years.

Reddy said each year there is food and dancing, but this year for the first time a professional dance group performed. Its dances represented four different parts of the Indian culture. This was also the first year the supper was catered. India Palace, an authentic Indian restaurant from Overland Park, Kan., catered the meal.

Reddy said the ISA put a 325-person limit to the supper because of the success of past years. The cost of the supper was $7 per person.

Mitch Mobley, senior in history, said he and Byron Johnson, junior in anthropology, saw the signs on campus and decided to attend.

"It's something totally out of your own culture," Mobley said.

Mobley and Johnson said they wanted a chance to eat authentic Indian food.

"We're kind of trying to broaden our horizons," Johnson said.

Mrudula Reddy, cultural coordinator for the India Student Association, said everyone needs to be exposed to other cultures.

"We thought everyone should see different cultures and expose themselves by eating different foods and seeing how they dress," Mrudula Reddy said.

The Chhaya Academy of Arts, a professional dance group from India, presented four types of traditional Indian dance. They danced the Chhau, Bharat Natyam, Kathak and Rajasthani dances. The group is composed of six people who sing, dance and play instruments that represent traditional Indian dance.

The dance group was sponsored by the India Student Association, International and area studies, and the departments of music and speech communication, theater and dance.

The performance following the meal was free of charge, but cost the sponsors $1,250.

Joyce Yagerline, associate professor of dance, said the performers are a professional group that is starting its national tour in Kansas.

"They're having a United States tour," Yagerline said. "They just came into the country on Thursday. They were at KU, and they just traveled to K-State.

"I think its a wonderful opportunity to bring multicultural diversity and performing arts here to K-State," she said.

The dancers will be on campus Monday to present an Indian dance master class at 12:30 in Ahearn 304 and a lecture demonstration at 3:30 p.m. in Nichols Theatre.

The dancers will stay with Lena Ferguson and Marguerite Jones of Manhattan while visiting K-State.

Lutheran fraternity celebrates heritage

JAMI NELSON
staff reporter

Martin Luther, a German preacher, founded the Lutheran religion upon which the Beta Sigma Psi fraternity focuses. To show its support of the Lutheran religion and its area churches, the fraternity sponsored a dinner at 6 p.m. Sunday at the Beta Sig fraternity house in honor of Luther's reformation in religion.

Luther, a Catholic monk, was unhappy with the Roman Catholic church and some of its principles. He formed 95 theses, or areas of concern with Catholicism, and nailed them to the door of a Roman Catholic church, Paul Mabrey, pastor at St. Luke's Lutheran Church, said.

GREEK LIFE

"We believe in the Lutheran religion that we are saved through faith alone," Mabrey said.

He said Lutherans do not believe in a purgatory, as Catholics do. The differences in beliefs signified the separation from the Catholic church led by Luther.

This split from Catholicism founded the Protestant religions. One of the religions created in this reformation was the Lutheran religion.

"It's a rallying point in the church. We thought it would be neat to extend it to our house," David Lott, Beta Sig president and senior in agricultural journalism, said. "The reformation dinner was proposed to us by our nationals. They wanted us to step up Lutheran religion in Manhattan this fall."

The date of the dinner was significant for several reasons. Luther posted his 95 theses on Oct. 31, 1517. Falling close to this date, Beta Sig members felt it would be appropriate to have the dinner on a Sunday.

The dinner included a sermon and scripture readings by David Beese, Beta Sig pastoral adviser and pastor at First Lutheran Church.

Members of Peace Lutheran Church, St. Luke's Lutheran Church, First Lutheran Church and the Beta Sig fraternity attended the dinner, said Brady Garren, Beta Sig public relations chairman and sophomore in business.

The dinner also reminded area churches of the fraternity's availability to help the Lutheran community, he said.

In the past, the fraternity has shown its support for the Lutheran community by volunteering. The fraternity has helped with a clothing drive and ushered at the Lutheran churches in Manhattan.

Also, all the fraternity's members attend a church service together once a month, which are referred to as "Beta Sig Sundays."

"This is another way we can get to know the congregations better," Lott said.

Being of Lutheran denomination is not required to be a Beta Sig. Lott said the fraternity has had non Lutherans, but these members usually end up converting to the Lutheran religion.

"If they want to join the fraternity, it's their choice to convert," Lott said.

He said it is otherwise difficult for non Lutherans to fully understand the meaning of the fraternity and the principles upon which it was founded.

Highs winds cause Manhattan residents to lose power Sunday

JULIE LINDAMOOD
staff reporter

Some Manhattan residents were in the dark Sunday afternoon — literally.

Due to high winds, there was a power outage that began around noon and affected residents in several locations in Manhattan, said Stacy Kohlmeier, KPL Gas Service operations manager.

"A little before noon the first outages started coming in," Kohlmeier said.

The outages were scattered all over town, but the biggest loss of power was on Kimball Avenue, Kohlmeier said. While the outage on Kimball only lasted about 20 minutes, Kohlmeier said it affected nearly 750 customers.

However, Manhattan residents weren't the only ones trying to find the light at the end of the tunnel. Area businesses also had to work around the power outages.

Kevin Metcalf, Kmart manager, said they had to close Kmart for more than three hours because of the loss of power.

"We were closed from 12:20 until 3:30," Metcalf said.

Kohlmeier said the outages were caused by high winds and blown line fuses around Manhattan. High winds cause trees to fall on lines and can make equipment break, both of which can cause a power outage, Kohlmeier said.

"Mostly, it's the trees that whip around and get into the lines," Kohlmeier said.

She said KPL still has the dispatch open because there are still some isolated outages coming in.

"I would imagine we'll have some crews out throughout the night just picking up small things here and there," Kohlmeier said.

Tornado injures 30 people, tears homes apart on Atlantic Coast

NEW SMYRNA BEACH, Fla. — A tornado skipped through this Atlantic Coast community early Sunday, tearing whole second stories off homes. Thirty people suffered minor injuries.

Firefighters had to dig some people out of beachside homes that collapsed during the storm that struck about 1:30 a.m. Thousands of customers lost power in the community just south of Daytona Beach.

The 64-unit DiamondHead Point condominium complex on the Indian River was devastated by the storm.

Roger Vayles said his wife Sal got up to close the window to keep rain out and was just returning to bed when the twister hit.

"It woke me up and almost sucked my wife out the window," said Vayles, a resident of the condo complex.

"I could see the barbecue grill on the porch take off like a bullet," Vayles said. His wife was treated for minor injuries.

No estimates of damage had been made Sunday.

Delegates strive to transform Perot's party into national force

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Reform Party members on Sunday wound up a national convention with encouragement from founder Ross Perot but little unity on a political strategy for becoming a national power.

During their three-day session, some 400 delegates approved a constitution and drafted a platform, taking steps needed to make the Reform Party a national organization rather than an alliance of state parties.

"This is going to be a really great adventure," Perot said during his keynote address Saturday night. "We've just got to keep up the fight."

Delegates spoke repeatedly of breaking the dominance of the Democratic and Republican parties in American politics. However, they and their leaders did not outline a strategy for doing it.

Reform Party leaders talked about influencing the debate on issues such as campaign finance reform and the federal budget. Other times, they advocated electing candidates by starting with municipal and state elections.

Perot said the party must attract disgruntled Americans who don't vote, but his comments were in context of his complaints that he would have been elected president in 1992 had most people voted their consciences.

32 hospitalized after unknown chemical released in Wal-Mart

BARBOURSVILLE, W.Va. — Authorities on Sunday investigated the apparent release of an irritating chemical inside a Wal-Mart store that sent 32 people to hospitals.

The identity of the chemical and the manner in which it was released were not immediately known. Store officials told police several suspicious people were seen in the store.

The 24-hour Wal-Mart evacuated all customers and personnel after the chemical was released late Saturday and remained closed for about eight hours during the night.

"Store employees first noticed people reacting to something, covering their mouths," Fields said. "Later, people reported having seen four individuals who looked like they didn't belong in the store leaving quickly."

Fields said authorities had not found anyone who witnessed the release, but said the chemical may have been sprayed from aerosol cans at about six locations inside the store.

Samples of what was believed to be the irritating chemical were taken from store shelves and sent to a police lab for analysis.

The 32 people who were taken to two hospitals in Huntington complained of burning eyes, nausea and throat irritation. All were treated and released early Sunday.

Professor uses newspapers to research society's values

ANDREA COREY
senior staff writer

Janice Hume is fascinated with death — well, kind of.

Hume

Hume, assistant professor of journalism and mass communications, read more than 8,000 obituaries for her research project.

"I think the obit study is my favorite because it was so bizarre," Hume said.

She said researching obituaries might seem morbid, but studying them is one way of arriving at a conclusion about societal values — what society thinks is important about someone's life — and how those values have changed.

She examined differences between the 19th and 20th centuries, and she found that values have changed.

Obituaries from the 19th century were about people's characteristics. They were described as generous, kind or loving. Later obituaries, those from the 20th century, were described in terms of where they worked and for how long.

"We became less about character and more about accomplishments," Hume said.

This kind of sociohistoric research is representative of Hume's work and her view of the world.

"What I like to do is to look at journalism history in sort of a different way. I like to look at it as a reflector of culture at different times in history," she said.

"It's a different way of looking at American history through media."

But Hume doesn't spend all her time researching society. She also teaches.

"The academic job is really twofold," she said. "I want to teach because that is how I keep my hand in the business, by training students to go out there and work."

Paul Parsons, professor of journalism and mass communications, said Hume fits into the department wonderfully.

"One, she has a lot of practical experience that gives a teacher confidence. Second, she has a sense of professionalism in the classroom, combined with third, a great sense of humor," he said.

Betty Winfield, professor of journalism at the University of Missouri, said Hume's sense of humor is one of her best qualities.

"She has one of those rare abilities to laugh at herself," she said. "She is just an absolute delight."

A good sense of humor is hard to hide and is often an important part of telling a story well. And, like Hume said, she is a good story teller. Perhaps it has something to do with being from Alabama.

"People in the South are story tellers. Everybody is. It's part of the way we communicate," she said.

Telling a story well helps journalism professors teach writers to do the same.

This semester, Hume teaches two sections of News and Feature Writing, a smaller class in which students learn how to write better, and one section of Mass Communication in Society, a large lecture class.

Hume said the improvement she sees in students in her writing class is gratifying, and said she teaches students to be proud of their work and their profession, though they will likely receive criticism for being in the field.

"Never, ever apologize if you do your job right," she said. "We have a place in history in what we do. Journalism is important to history. All you have to do is know you did your job."

She said teaching students how to be good journalists is important.

"What we do as journalists is important and very necessary. And then above that, what we do as journalism educators is important because we train people to do that work, work that I think is very important," she said.

Hume chose to do the work she thinks is so important at K-State. She could have chosen other schools, but picked K-State because she liked the idea of a traditional journalism school.

"I picked it because of the fact that it is a school of journalism with good student publications that try to train students to go out and be journalists."

Hume said she likes both facets of her twofold job — teaching and research.

"I also enjoy the research very much," she said. "And that's a way that I can challenge myself — my way to keep writing, and I can do in-depth research you can't ever do when you're in journalism."

So far, all of Hume's research was completed at the University of Missouri, and she is working on another study with Winfield. She earned her master's degree and doctorate at Missouri, where the obituary project served as her doctoral dissertation.

Hume's undergraduate work was also done at Missouri, and after earning her bachelor's degree, she worked at the Mobile Press Register for 12 years, serving as lifestyle editor for the last half of those years.

Styles of prosecution, defense contrast in Oklahoma City trial

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DENVER — Lead Oklahoma City bombing prosecutor Larry Mackey is an eye-of-the-storm kind of guy, a fatherly figure, calming and methodical in the courtroom and rarely raising his voice or gesturing.

His opponent, lead defense attorney Michael Tigar, often is the storm, unpredictable and theatrical, a magician who pulls obscure bits of knowledge out of the air to prove his points.

Their sharply contrasting styles promise to set the stage for sharp drama when the bombing trial of Terry Nichols begins to unfold today.

"I think it's an interesting match-up," said Andrew Cohen, a Denver attorney and media analyst for the trials of Nichols and co-defendant Timothy McVeigh. "Mackey is low-key, very steady, sort of the turtle in the turtle and the hare story. Tigar is very flashy and dramatic and charismatic, much more a visible force than Mackey."

As different as the two antagonists are, so are the cases against Nichols and McVeigh.

The two men met in Army basic training in 1988 and formed a friendship based on their shared dislike of government. McVeigh went on to become a decorated soldier in the Gulf War while Nichols left the service to care for his son.

Prosecutors say the two bombed the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in retaliation for the government's deadly raid on the Branch Davidians compound near Waco, Texas, on April 19, 1993.

Both men were charged with murder, conspiracy and weapons-related counts. McVeigh's appeal is pending.

During McVeigh's trial, prosecutors showed he began plotting the bombing months in advance, and they introduced a receipt for ammonium nitrate, one of the key bomb components. They also linked him to the rental of the truck that carried the bomb.

Prosecutors contend Nichols assisted McVeigh in the planning stages by purchasing ammonium nitrate and stealing explosives. Nichols also is accused of robbing a gun dealer to raise money for the bombing, helping McVeigh stow a getaway car in Oklahoma City and helping assemble the bomb.

Tigar tried to develop a rapport with each prospective juror: He spoke Latin with a Latin teacher, discussed bioenergetics with a clinic manager and talked about goats with a woman who lives on a farm.

He and Woods asked prospective jurors if they knew Nichols' whereabouts on the day of the blast, how McVeigh was arrested and how Nichols "came into contact with law enforcement." They also asked the candidates what they would think about a defendant who didn't testify and relied on attorneys appointed at taxpayers' expense.

Roy Sells, whose wife, Leora Lee, died in the bombing, called Tigar a good lawyer "who is slick with words and phrases ... who is going to try to persuade this jury that his version is the honest-to-God truth."

Students who plan for enrollment avoid headaches, other pains

Ouch. Enrollment sure can smart, but if you follow a few guidelines, you won't have to go through mega aches and pains.

Enrollment begins today, so many seniors might already be winners. Or they might at least have appointments in Willard Hall in the near future.

Meet with your advisers if you haven't already. But they're probably just as stressed as you are now, so don't depend on them blindly. Double-check your transcript and your schedule plans. Make sure you won't be surprised with an extra semester because you didn't pay attention to your requirements.

If you're graduating in May, it's probably too late to do much damage control. Either you can graduate, or you've already been surprised by the realization of another glorious semester at K-State.

If you're planning to leave these hallowed halls after the summer or fall semesters, you can still save yourself that hassle. Make sure the classes you sign up for will put you on track for that final semester. And remember to do a graduation check when the spring semester starts.

When it gets down to that enrollment appointment in Willard, be prepared. Make a checklist. Do you have your enrollment form? Do you have all the signatures you need? Do you have the permission slips you need?

If you show up without these essentials, you're wasting your time. Not to mention the time of the people behind you in line and the people who work at enrollment.

Check the closed class list shortly before you go to Willard. It's on the Internet at www.ksu.edu/courses/spring1998/closed.html.

Have a few emergency classes ready, so in case a class you want is closed, you can make a quick switch.

And go to Willard as close to your appointed time as possible. If all students go at their assigned times, the whole process will be less painful.

Flashback

Ugly '70s comeback must be stopped

VIEWPOINT

MARY RENEE SMITH

MARY RENEE SMITH is a sophomore in speech. You can send e-mail to Mary at majo@ksu.edu.

Walking through a thrift store the other day, I had a bad flashback. The image of little spider plants growing in used jelly jars. The smell of incense. The feel of polyester against my skin. All of these memories were brought on by seeing a macrame plant hanger for sale.

You know the kind. I know your house had at least one. If your mom was way into macrame, you had one of those freaky-looking owls with the wooden beads for eyes.

The 1970s are back in a big way, and we need to stop it before it goes too far.

The '70s were an ugly time. The country was trying to heal the wounds of the Vietnam War. There were gas shortages. The hippies were waking up from their trips. Disco was beginning.

The president was lying on national television. Minorities were being oppressed. Women were paid less. Children had no rights. Some things never change, I guess.

Apparently, through some strange chain of events, bell-bottom pants and polyester are in again. I have my own theory about this. All of us who were forced as children to wear velour shirts, corduroy pants or culottes and moon boots by our parents are trying to convince the world that these clothes are cool. We hope somehow coolness will be retroactive, and we will be looked upon as being ahead of our time — not just dorky kids in stupid clothes.

What frightens me most about this trend to relive the '70s is the interior decorating styles. Clothes you can throw away and the bad fashion might only live for a season. Interior design is more permanent. If you buy a $300 couch, you're not throwing it out any time soon. Those macrame hanging plant holders and scary owl things are just the beginning.

Let me take you on a tour through a typical suburban home in 1977. I'll bet my kids' Halloween loot that your parents' house looked like this. Your grandparents' home might still bear the scars of the '70s.

The living room has multicolored shag carpet, in either oranges or blues. Shag so long you can take a rake to it. There is either fake wood paneling or wallpaper with the paisley pattern. The kind of wallpaper with the fuzzy stuff on it. My interior design friend calls it flocked.

The television is in this huge fake wooden console thing with aluminum foil flags on the rabbit ears. On the back of what you now recognize as the world's most repulsive couch is an afghan in colors too hideous to mention. The afghan serves no real purpose — it can't keep you warm because the holes in the knitting are too large.

My parents had an end table with a drawer in it. As a kid I remember the drawer was full of funny little papers, a lighter and one of those funny-looking clips with the feathers and the beads on it.

The kitchen decor is dominated by one of two colors — harvest gold or avocado. Everything is this color — the stove, the refrigerator and the sink. The countertops are also one of these terrible colors but with gold flecks in the formica. Orange Tupperware canisters with a gold designs sit on the counter below a shelf with either a spoon or thimble collection.

The dining room table is also formica with a crack down the middle where the leaf goes when guests come over. Once a week, my mom would take a butter knife and scrape the crap out of that crack.

Let me digress here and point out that throughout my childhood the butter knife was the most amazing tool in our house. My mother used a butter knife to scrape out that nasty stuff in the table and the stuff between the tiles in the bathroom. She used it as a screwdriver, and she would flip it around and use the handle as a hammer.

Anyway, back to our tour.

As you walk down the hallway to the bathroom, you can't help but notice the metal butterflies hanging on the walls next to the pictures of you and your siblings wearing those ugly clothes.

The bathroom is pink — very pink — even the tub. There's a shaggy lid cover on the toilet making it impossible to make the lid stay up. A padded seat cover hides beneath the fuzzy lid. A Barbie doll with a huge crocheted shirt that covered the spare roll of toilet paper sits on the back of the toilet.

The bedrooms were decorated with latch-hook rugs and Star Wars figurines or Holly Hobby bedding.

The tour serves no real purpose except to warn you not to buy into this '70s revival too much. Hopefully, it gives you a good laugh to start your week.

Soap operas lull viewers into addiction

KRIS EMMONS/Collegian

This has been an exciting week for me.

First, I was bombarded by gunfire as I tried to flee the palatial drug-estate of Ernesto Galazogula with the stolen CIA documents I was assigned to get by my wife's cousin's friend's barber's nephew's stepson, aka my brother, who mysteriously appeared on our front porch in Maine after we all thought he had died in a plane crash somewhere over Greenland in episode 28.

Then I got ebola in the jungle and was being eaten by a lion, but right before the lion got to my vital organs, I was saved by some girl scouts camping in the Paraguay wilderness. They were able to scare the lion away by banging pots and pans together.

I was then rushed to Paraguay General Hospital, where I grew new legs and was visited by "All My Children." My wife couldn't make it, because she was busy cheating on me with Stefano from "Days of Our Lives," but she sent her regards.

I had to wait for some natives to bring back Gujubroo root (which is a little-known cure for ebola and a fantastic breath-freshener), then I was flown out of Paraguay into "Another World," almost made a pact with the devil to kill Stefano, but I was saved in the last minute by the "Guiding Light." A typical day for "The Young and the Restless" — and that was only Monday.

VIEWPOINT

JON KURCHE

JON KURCHE is a freshman in physics. You can send e-mail to Jon at jsk6609@ksu.edu.

Actually, the most exciting thing I did last week was studying for midterms, but if you were able to follow that last bit of jibber-jabber, then you've probably been watching daytime television, or soap operas — stuff networks air for people with no taste. Who needs to study anyway?

I, too, watch soaps every now and then.

The funny part is that I never used to. My pre-adolescent sister would always watch them because adolescents are supposed to watch bad television. Daytime programming is a natural progression from the stuff they air on Nickelodeon. I always made fun of her for it — that's what adolescent brothers do. Then I would take the remote away and we would fight until "Who's the Boss" reruns came on. This is how it went in my house.

Soap operas were always some sort of pariah. Apparently my mom became addicted to them during my early childhood. She was bad, scheduling appointments around them ("Oh, Jonathan's got a 108-degree fever. I'll take him to the doctor after "General Hospital" ...").

She would schedule meals around them, and she would schedule nap-time through them, which was a bummer for me. I still remember when I was 14, she would send me to bed and shut the door and tell me to count to 60, 60 times, regardless of whether I was tired. We knew there was a problem. She joined a 12-step program at "Soaps Anonymous." After that, soaps were banned in my house. I never felt an interest in watching them.

Then I came to college.

This is a place where people watch all kinds of bad television including "Beverly Hills 90210," "Melrose Place," programming on MTV, soap operas, anything with David Hasselhoff and "Jerry Springer." The list goes on and on. I don't know what happens, but it's as if people graduate high school and then — BLAMMO! — they become perpetually tacky.

I went home during the day last week, a luxury that is rare for me, and I found my roommates watching "Days of Our Lives." They're business-related majors, so they have time to waste. I love those guys.

I started to make fun of them, taunting them with: "Ha, ha. You're watching soap operas, ha, ha ..." when I became involved with what was happening on the television. Bo and Billie were discussing their relationship. This was compelling to me. I don't know why, but I sat there, jaw open, little rivulets of saliva running down my chin, watching the whole episode. I wanted Bo and Billie to be together, to hell with Hope, whoever she was. Against my better judgment, I felt for these people.

Why was I empathizing with such fake, poorly acted characters?

I think most of us ask that kind of question when we first see soaps. Nobody likes to admit they're a soap opera watcher. They always talk about soaps but follow it up with, "But I don't watch it that often," or "I can't help it. I'm addicted."

We all watch these things ... why not admit it?

I think the reason everybody gets into them in the first place is because they're filled with hypnotic messages. It's sort of like tobacco companies manipulating nicotine levels in cigarettes — it just happens. How many people have missed out on something because of soaps? How many lives have been ruined by them? Does the Food and Drug Administration need to regulate their production?

I can't answer that. "General Hospital" is coming on.

Student seating must grow with privilege fee

Editor,

I am a sophomore, and I have been attending every home football game since my freshman year. I think K-State football is very exciting. I hope our football program will continue to grow.

Lately, the KSU Stadium expansion and the privilege fee have been hot issues. It's not right for students to be paying for one-third of the expansion while being given seating that is further up and away from the playing field.

I'm all for the $1 privilege fee and the expansion of the stadium. However, I would like to see additional student seating in sections 22 and 23. I urge Max Urick and the committee who will be deciding the issue to agree that if the student body passes the referendum, then our expanded seating will be in sections 22 and 23 — closer to the action and the fun.

Library should be more important than stadium

Editor,

This is in response to the article published Oct. 22, "Growing Pains." I am for the expansion of KSU Stadium, but I take great offense to Max Urick's attempt pressure the student body to vote "yes" on the referendum.

In the article, Urick was quoted as saying, "A vote yes gives the students definite priority over the public for 2,500 more seats now and in the future. A vote no puts them in direct competition with one another."

In a previous article, published Oct. 13., Urick said, "I'm trying to generate as much revenue as I can, but for the student tickets I sell that are over 7,500, I'm losing $100 per ticket. I don't want to do that, but I also don't want the students out. I want them there."

Why should K-State students be forced to finance one-third of the expansion budget when less than half of the student body is promised seats, even under the new expansion?

I refuse to be pressured into paying for a new stadium where there is a desperate need to fund the library. If K-State was really founded in the premise of providing an education, then we must set priorities, like funding periodicals before an expanded stadium.

To Urick and Coach Bill Snyder: K-State is an educational institution, not an NFL franchise.

Campus bike racks lack proper lighting, safety

Editor,

About 10 percent of the student body, or 2,000 people, use a bicycle as a means of transportation. It came to my attention that a number of the bike racks lack enough light.

For instance, the racks east of Dickens and north of Bluemont halls are lit by one little spotlight extending from the side of Dickens. If people have combination locks on their bikes, it makes it difficult to see what one is doing.

An increase in lighting on the racks that have little or no lighting would not only make things easier; it may also decrease theft and increase personal security.

LOOKINGback

1952 - Frozen bread was offered for sale for the first time this day. A supermarket in Chester, N.Y., featured the stuff — an invention of a local baker. It used the quick-freeze technology developed by Clarence Birdseye (of today's Birdseye frozen foods fame).

1956 - The classic MGM film "The Wizard of Oz" was first seen on television this day. The film cost CBS $250,000 to show. The movie was shown 18 times between 1956 and 1976, and you can probably catch it again no matter what year it is.

'Rocky Horror Picture Show'

400 TURN OUT FOR VIRGIN AUCTION, FESTIVITIES

CLIF PALMBERG/Collegian

MICHEAL NAWROCKI, second-year student in veterinary medicine, is interviewed by master of ceremonies Mary Renee Smith, sophomore in speech, during the opening of "The Rocky Horror Picture Show" on Saturday night in the K-State Student Union. Before the show, those who came in costume were judged for best costume. Nawrocki, dressed as a proctologist, won Saturday's competition.

The strains of the "Time Warp" once again filled the Union Ballroom on Friday and Saturday night as the annual showing of "The Rocky Horror Picture Show" got under way. More than 400 people lined up to be pelted with rice, sprayed with water and otherwise harassed during this Halloween tradition.

"It was nice that this year it fell on Halloween. I think that brought out a lot more people," said Colin Rafferty, Kaleidoscope Films chairman.

"I think this is the best thing about Halloween. I couldn't find anyone to come with me, so figured what the hell," said Sally Hawley, graduate student in accounting.

The festivities began at midnight with a costume contest and a virgin auction. Virgins are individuals who have never been to "The Rocky Horror Picture Show" before.

The virgins were auctioned off to audience members for everything from a map to the K-State sheep barns to the University of Kansas football team's lingerie.

"This is my first time. I've been wanting to do 'Rocky Horror' for years. I've heard about it, and I was really pumped for the virgin auction," said Lexi Thompson, freshman in hotel and restaurant management.

The costume contest differed from past years with the addition of prizes. The winners received Union Program Council film passes for different amounts.

Both nights had audience members dressed as characters from the film, with men in lingerie being a popular choice. Also present were repeat viewers of the movie.

"I've been coming to the showing at K-State for four years. This is my 31st showing," said Michael Nawrocki, second-year student in veterinary medicine.

Also new this year was the master of ceremonies. Mary Renee Smith, sophomore in speech, filled in for past Master of Ceremonies Kevyn Jacobs.

"It went very well. I had a lot of fun. I was a little nervous beforehand," Smith said. "There was some pressure because Kevyn Jacobs has emceed for so long and he knows the movie so well."

Smith's jobs were to keep the crowd going, auction off virgins and lead the costume contest. She also helped lead the audience participation cues.

"It was really neat for me to see how the crowd personalized the cues to K-State. There was people yelling stuff about Landon Lectures and KU's football team," Smith said. "Saturday night's crowd was smaller, which was good because the audience could hear themselves."

While Friday night brought out mostly college students, Saturday night had more non-students and die-hard Rocky fans.

"I heard a lot of people say they were glad to see that we make such a big deal out of it here at K-State and included so many people," Smith said.

Although the average "Rocky Horror Picture Show" performance comes across as controlled chaos, it is chaos with a purpose and a tradition.

College Bowl winners to compete in regionals

CORBIN H. CRABLE
staff writer

While most K-State students were waking up and getting ready to tune in to the Texas Tech game Saturday, almost 40 students were getting ready to participate in the varsity sport for the mind.

The College Bowl ended with the victory of Four Jerks and a Squirt. The team emerged triumphant with 185 points to Chris Long's Team's 55 points.

Powered only by coffee and reruns of "Jeopardy!," the participants of the ninth-annual College Bowl filled the Cats' Pause lounge at 9 Saturday morning in the K-State Student Union.

The College Bowl, sponsored by the Union Program Council's Issues and Ideas Committee, consists of eight teams made up of four to five contestants each. Two of these teams are taken into a private room, where they compete in two rounds of a "Jeopardy"-style game, each round lasting seven minutes.

In those seven minutes, the mediator asks the teams questions with diverse topics, ranging from current events to TV show trivia to the components of asbestos. The initial questions, called the "toss-up" questions, are worth 10 points each. If a team answers the toss-up question correctly, it is asked a bonus question. The value of a bonus question can be anywhere from 20 to 30 points.

The first time a team loses in this 14-minute session, it is placed in the losers' bracket. The teams in the losers' bracket then compete against each other, as do the teams in the winners' bracket. Once a team in the losers' bracket is defeated, it is eliminated completely. This process is referred to as "double elimination."

Finally, the winning teams in both the winners' and losers' brackets compete against each other in the final round. If the winners' bracket team wins, the tournament is over. If the losers' bracket team wins, the round must be played one more time to determine the actual winner.

The winning team then must attend regionals.

To be involved in the College Bowl, one simply needs to volunteer, form a team and attend a series of informational meetings. Most of those on this year's eight teams were seasoned veterans and had few concerns as to where the day's events would take them.

"Our team is very relaxed," said Jay Witt, senior in economics, philosophy and political science and member of the team They Might Be Spermologers. "We're not taking today too seriously. We're very laid back as a team."

Fellow team member Becky Heine, junior in biology, said she agreed. "We're just looking to have a good time," she said.

"We always play Trivial Pursuit as a warm-up," said Joe Ashley, junior in mass communications.

For some College Bowl veterans, being around their teammates was their primary source of relaxation.

"I did the College Bowl as a freshman in '95," said Amanda Simpson, junior in chemistry and mathematics. "When I was a freshman, I didn't know anyone on my team. This year I'm around people I know."

In the first three hours of the College Bowl, the eight teams were sorted into the winners' bracket or the losers' bracket, while others, who had been defeated in the losers' bracket, were eliminated from the competition completely.

"The questions started complicated but narrowed down to those with a simple answer," said Dustin Petrik, freshman in microbiology and member of the team The Highwaymen, who remained in the winners' bracket at the end of the first round.

The teams weren't the only ones having fun with the event. Even the mediator, Heather Lansdowne, graduate student in public administration, said she enjoyed the competition.

"I enjoy this because I like the knowledge and the participation. It's fun to see how the teams do," said Lansdowne, who participated in High Q, a scholars' bowl for high school students.

In the second and final round, the competition was narrowed down to the teams Four Jerks and a Squirt, the winners in the winners' bracket, and the aptly named Chris Long's Team, the winners in the losers' bracket.

Long, sophomore in engineering and team captain, admitted he was surprised his team even made it to the final round.

"I didn't think we'd make it past the first round," Long said.

Aaron Carman, team captain of Four Jerks and a Squirt and junior in biology, saw his team's victory as an almost effortless one.

"We haven't got any smarter; the questions just got easier," Carman said. "But for regionals, we'll practice by watching plenty of 'Jeopardy!'."

Regionals for the College Bowl will be Feb. 20-22 at the University of Missouri.

THE K-STATE DEFENSE brings down Texas Tech's Ricky Williams during the K-State 13-2 victory Saturday in Lubbock, Texas. Williams ran for 38 yards in the game.

Bishop dethroned by Texas Tech defense; K-State defense keeps Tech out of end zone

SUN DEE MILLS

LUBBOCK, Texas — After already tossing two interceptions to Texas Tech defensive players, junior quarterback Michael Bishop attempted a screen pass in the second drive of the fourth quarter. Bishop's attempt failed as Tech defensive end Montae Reagor grabbed that pass and ran 10 yards to the K-State 3-yard line.

Bishop was undoubtedly disappointed, but was unavailable after the game for comment. Coach Bill Snyder said the failed screen determined the offensive scheme for the remainder of the game.

"The safest pass in the country is the screen pass," Snyder said. "When you get that intercepted, then I was pretty hard-pressed not to throw the ball again."

As it was, the Cats were only up 6-2, and the Red Raiders were three yards from a score. But Snyder said he knew as K-State lined up, there was no way Tech was going to score.

"I was so pleased with the way they went onto the field, with confidence that Tech would not get the ball into the end zone," Snyder said.

Free safety Lamar Chapman said he agreed.

"When we took the field, we knew we could hold them out of the end zone," he said. "We thought it might be a field goal."

Cat linebacker Jeff Kelly said although the defense was tired, he and his fellow players were determined and energetic.

"It's nothing against the offense, but I want to be on the field," Kelly said. "Before the play, I went out there jumping and screaming."

Tech quarterback Zebbie Lethridge ran the ball two yards and the Red Raiders were breathing down the Cats' backs, but to no avail.

On the next play, Lethridge attempted a quarterback sneak. As he dove over the pile, the ball was knocked loose. Kelly said he was responsible.

"I anticipated the quarterback sneak," Kelly said. "I kind of expected him to run. My goal was to just try and stop him from getting it into the end zone. I hit Zebbie, and I didn't know where I was going. I looked at the refs, and I saw Chap on top of the ball."

The ball bounced into the end zone, where Chapman grabbed it and held on.

"I'd seen him try to jump over the top," Chapman said. "I knew it was a fumble."

Cat linebacker Travis Ochs said he was covering the tight end and watched the whole play unfold.

"I figured they were going to run something up the center," Ochs said. "The ball was just sitting there. I almost froze. I couldn't believe it."

But there was controversy at the goal line.

"The refs were questioning, 'Was he over before he fumbled it?' and I was like, 'No, no, no,'" Kelly said.

While the crowd anxiously waited for the referees to make a ruling, Ochs and Chapman said they were not worried.

"I knew it was our ball," Ochs said. "I didn't doubt it for a second."

After the play was officially ruled a fumble, jubilant celebration broke out in the K-State end zone.Lethridge said the referees made a mistake.

"I believed that I was in the end zone before I fumbled," Lethridge said. "That is the decision they made and we will have to live with it."

Snyder said he was proud of the defensive effort the entire game, but the forced fumble was the icing on the cake.

"The crowning glory of the day had to be when they got the ball on the 1-yard line, and we managed to hold them out of the end zone," he said. "It was a great effort from outrdefense and our defensive coaches."

Defensive coordinator Mike Stoops said the fumble swung the momentum in the Cats' direction.

"Zebbie's fumble changed the whole composition of the game," Stoops said. "The guys felt confident on the field to come up with the big play."

In retrospect, Red Raider coach Spike Dykes said he might have made a mistake.

"It was probably a bad call going for the quarterback sneak," Dykes said. "I thought it might work. It didn't work. It was a hard-knocking football game."

Cats sneak by Texas Tech, 13-2, in tough defensive battle

SUN DEE MILLS
sports editor

LUBBOCK, Texas — The game lasted three hours and 10 minutes, but Coach Bill Snyder said the Texas Tech defensive efforts made Saturday's 13-2 victory last much longer.

"We're about 70 and one right now," Snyder said. "I don't feel like we've won that many, but I feel like we played that many."

Defensively, the Cats held scrambling quarterback Zebbie Lethridge to 20 rushes for 48 yards, and Lethridge completed eight of 27 pass attempts for 64 yards.

"We came into this knowing we would have to play good defense," defensive coordinator Mike Stoops said. "We executed our plan, and we're very pleased with the defensive effort."

On the offensive side of the ball, neither team produced a stellar performance. The Red Raiders' defense scored the team's only points, and Snyder said the Cats' offense never found a comfortable niche.

"Offensively, when they were good, we were bad, and when we were good, they were bad." Snyder said. "I thought that we were not a very good football team today."

The ball changed hands five times before either team gained a first down, and the Cats were that team. On K-State's second possession, the Cats attained their first of seven penalties, a delay of game that moved the team back 14 yards. Bishop's next pass to junior tight end Justin Swift was broken up and Bishop was shaken up on the play.

Enter Jonathan Beasley, stage left. After he ran for six yards, Bishop returned and was picked off on the next play by Red Raider cornerback Darwin Brown. Brown picked up five yards on the interception, but Tech punted three plays later.

With 7:15 left in the first, K-State gained their first first down of the game. Bishop called the drive's first two plays, but Beasley returned on the third.

Facing second and eight on the K-State 20, Beasley was under pressure but completed a deep pass to Cat wide receiver Gavin Peries, who ran it into the end zone. Another Cat penalty for holding moved the ball back to the K-State seven-yard line, and the score did not count.

Beasley, again under pressure, was pushed back into the end zone. He attempted to get a pass off but was called for intentional grounding. Tech was awarded a safety on the play and Red Raider cornerback Duane Price was credited with a sack.

"It was a great play. I went the wrong way," Beasley said. "I just tried to get rid of them."

Neither team got another first down until the second play of the second quarter, when Bishop moved through the Tech defense on third and nine, avoiding at least three tackles, for a 10-yard gain. Snyder said Bishop's injured ankle is healthy, but he struggled Saturday.

"Michael is as tough as anybody," Snyder said. "You talk about toughness, you need to credit the Texas Tech defense. They smacked him around good. I think his pride is hurt more than anything."

The Red Raider defense finally allowed the Cats to enter Tech territory on this drive with a 25-yard slant pass to Swift. But false start penalties and Bishop being sacked for a nine-yard loss put the Cats back onto their own ground.

"Field position was a factor today," Snyder said. "We spent too much time on the wrong end of the field."

To end the drive, Cat punter James Garcia hit a 51-yarder into the wind that ended up at the Tech 4-yard line.

"It was probably when I felt I was going to have a good game," Garcia said. "When they had eight up (on the line), they had come after it. I knew I had to hit it quick."

Snyder said Garcia, who had eight punts averaging 48.4 yards each, had a fine game.

"What Texas Tech did offensively was somewhat similar to a year ago," Snyder said. "James hit Tech deep into their own end last year and he did so again today."

Tech's first first down didn't come until the last two minutes of the second quarter. Lethridge completed a deep 15-yard pass to receiver Donnie Hart. Again, the drive ended in a punt. The Red Raiders punted 14 times in the game.

"It was an ugly offensive performance," Lethridge said. But the worst was yet to come for the Red Raiders.

Early in the fourth, Bishop tossed a screen pass that was intercepted by Red Raider defensive end Montae Reagor, who returned the ball to the K-State 3-yard line.

Lady Luck was not with the Red Raiders as they lined up on the three. Lethridge ran the ball two yards, but fumbled it on the quarterback sneak — designed to attain the touchdown. K-State free safety Lamar Chapman recovered the ball in the end zone and the Cats got a touchback.

"If I would have gotten into the end zone, the game really would have turned around," Reagor said. "Things didn't go our way today."

Things started to go the Cats' way as Beasley returned to the field. Three possessions later, the Cats took advantage of good starting field position on the Tech 33-yard line. Beasley took off to the left and ran uncontested into the end zone for K-State's second touchdown. Kicker Martin Gramatica's extra point put the Cats up 13-2.

"We were just able to make them collapse," Beasley said. "I got some great blocks from Gavin and Darnell McDonald."

Beasley ran seven times for 59 yards, the longest rush being the touchdown run. He threw once with no completion, but Beasley said he is always ready to go onto the field.

"That's my job. That's what No. 2 is," Beasley said. "I must be mentally prepared to get into the game."

Snyder said that after the Reagor interception, he did not want the ball in the air, and he thought Beasley did an excellent job of directing the game's end.

"Jonathan's performance today tells what I've said all along. The question of Bishop being a starter was not an easy choice," Snyder said. "I've never had any reservations playing him. He's made great improvements since Ohio."

BIG 12 RUNDOWN

The way hopes and coaches kept vanishing in Kansas, Missouri and K-State prompted pundits in the 1970s and '80s to label them the Bermuda Triangle of college football.

Now, in the first week of November 1997, almost everything has come an incredible full circle.

Almost. No. 1 Nebraska (8-0 overall, 5-0 Big 12) is more dominant than ever, gunning for its third national championship in four years. But poor Oklahoma is coming off the worst whipping in its history, a 69-7 humiliation Saturday at the hands of the top-ranked Huskers.

Moreover, Kansas, K-State and Missouri all won on the same day. All three of the Big 12 North members are poised to capture winning records. And for the first time since the dawn of the age of mammals, all three could be headed for bowls in the same season.

The Bermuda Triangle has become Fantasy Island.

Only three times — 1968, 1981 and 1995 — have two Triangle schools gone bowling in the same season. Now No. 11 K-State (7-1, 4-1) is taking aim at its first Alliance Bowl bid following Saturday's 13-2 victory at Texas Tech.

Kansas, in Terry Allen's first year as head coach, stands 5-4 and 3-3 after beating Iowa State (1-7, 1-4) by a deceptively close final score of 34-24. The Jayhawks could become bowl eligible by winning just one of their last two games, at K-State and at Texas.

Missouri, in Larry Smith's fourth season, has snapped out of a 13-year losing cycle. A rousing 41-31 upset at Colorado (4-4, 2-3) assured the Tigers (6-3, 4-2) of their first winning season as well as their first bowl bid since 1983.

"This is a great victory for everybody who has waited all these years," said Smith, whose Tigers have upset Texas, Oklahoma State and Colorado in a breakthrough three-week stretch.

"All those years, those people suffered," Smith said. "Many people have gotten off the wagon. But there were a heck of a lot that stayed on. This is for them, too."

In the Big 12's South Division, there was also ample proof of changing times. Once-mighty Texas dropped to 3-5 overall and 1-4 in the conference with a 23-21 loss to Baylor (4-5, 2-3), the only team Iowa State has managed to beat.

No. 21 Texas A&M (6-2, 3-2) handed No. 25 Oklahoma State (6-2, 3-2) its second overtime loss in a row, 28-25, creating a three-way tie in the South between the Cowboys, Red Raiders and Aggies.

While Colorado's slide has not been as steep or deep as Oklahoma's, the Buffs are another one-time power fallen upon hard times.

Coach Rick Neuheisel said the Buffs "had a tremendous amount of mistakes that cost us dearly. But that's not to take away from Missouri's effort. They played flawlessly. I thought they punched us out. Their game plan was to slug it out and work the clock, and we couldn't stop them."

DUVAL WINS GPA

HOUSTON — David Duval closed with two scrambling pars to win his third consecutive tournament at the Tour Championship on Sunday, denying Davis Love III a chance to edge out Tiger Woods for the season money title.

Duval, who made a 40-foot eagle putt on No. 13 to move into a tie for the lead and then recovered from the rough on Nos. 17 and 18, became the first player to win three consecutive starts on the PGA Tour since Nick Price in 1993.

"Three victories in a year, no matter how they are spaced out, is a great year," Duval said.

Duval, who will be 26 next week, had seven second-place finishes and was developing a nasty label as a guy unable to finish off tournaments. That label is long gone, and he now seems drenched in confidence.

Love bogeyed the last hole knowing he needed a birdie to tie Duval and would have won the money title if he had won the season-ending event.

"I would have liked to have finished a little better," Love said. "But it was nice to make Tiger sweat a little bit on the back nine."

"It just gives you the confidence to know you can do it," Duval said about how his recent wins helped him claim the $720,000 first prize.

The money title went to Woods with a record $2,066,833 despite finishing 12th at Champions Golf Club, and he likely will be voted player of the year by PGA Tour members later this year.

Duval finished second on the money list with $1,885,308 and Love finished third with $1,635,953.

Working It Out.

The term "aerobics instructor" is out of date and has been declared officially dead by the American Council on Exercise. That's because it doesn't cover classes such as spinning and other classes involving fitness and exercise. The new term: group fitness instructor.

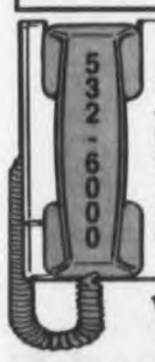
SPORTS TRIVIA CONTEST

The fifth annual Sports Trivia Contest will be held Thursday, November 13, at the Recreation Complex. Participants will take a 60-question test in the preliminary round. Four categories of sports will be covered on the test: Football, Basketball, Baseball and Miscellaneous. The top eight participants will advance to the final head-to-head tournament. If you are a trivia expert or a sports buff, this contest is for you!
Entries will be accepted thru Fri., Nov. 7 at 5 p.m. in the business office.

My Favorite Workout

Cesar Rodriguez, senior in human development and life span, uses the facilities not only for pick-up games of soccer, but also to stay in shape as he trains for Division II soccer tryouts. With his sights set on Denver or Omaha, he follows a workout plan that includes running, biking, StairMaster and lifting. He said he likes to use the facility particularly due to the enormous variety of equipment offered. "I've got to take advantage of it" said Rodriguez. "I probably won't see anything like this when I leave K-State." After graduating this December, he hopes to continue playing soccer. If it doesn't work out, Rodriguez said he will start looking for a job in Denver.

Who's Who at the Rec



"It's great to see the interest from students" said Stefanie Huff, senior in biology and pre-med. "It's also nice to see the University recognizes how important fitness is." Huff is in her second year of teaching aerobics for Recreational Services and currently leads step and double step classes. "It's fun to see familiar faces on campus," she said, "then make the connection that I recognize them from the Rec." Although she doesn't plan to teach aerobics after college, she's glad she had the opportunity to work for the Rec doing something she enjoys. After graduation in May, Huff will attend the University of Nebraska College of Medicine

Student teaching in Junction City consumes much of Brad Fabrizius' schedule, but he still makes time to work for Recreational Services. Fabrizius started as an assistant building supervisor in the spring of 1994 and currently holds the position of building supervisor. "I've worked here a long time," he said, "and I'm going to miss seeing everyone." Fabrizius said he also spends a lot of time at the Rec participating in intramural sports. "I've met a ton of people working and playing at the Rec" he said. "It's been fun to watch all the intramural sports on and off the job." With graduation next month, he hopes to find a job teaching in Kansas. He said he will continue to use the Rec as an alumni if he is in the area.

Facility FOCUS

Recreational Services will be adding two new seated leg curl machines in our strength area both in the weight/fitness area and circuit area. The advantage of the seated leg curl is that an individual can utilize this piece without having to lay down in the prone position. These new machines should arrive within the month.

Fitness Facts

A survey conducted by the Fitness Products Council for 1996 found the most popular exercise among frequent exercisers is fitness walking, with 14.5 million people participating 100 times or more in 1996. The number of frequent fitness walkers has increased 41% from 10.3 million in 1987. Free weights were second in the survey with 12 million participants up 82% (6.6 million) from 1987. (Fitness Products Council Newsletter, September/October 1997)

Outdoor Rental Center

The Outdoor Rental Center will be CLOSED during the winter months. November 3 is the last day of operation this season; however, special arrangements can be made by calling the Recreational Services office at 532-6980. Twenty-four hour notice is required for any rental over the winter.

Intramural MANIA

The Intramural program offers a wide variety of individual and team sports. All students, faculty and staff are invited to participate. It's a great way to meet people, have fun and stay fit!

Nutrition NOTES

Cutting calories to lose weight may help in dropping pounds; however, cutting too many calories can slow down reaction time and increase the chances of having an accident. A group of US and UK government scientists tested 14 women from ages 25-42 for five months. The subjects consumed only half the number of calories of their normal intake. Using standardized tests, the findings indicate a 6% decline in reaction time. The researchers express concern that the slowed reaction time could be enough to increase the risk of auto accidents or danger when using machinery. (Environmental Nutrition, September 1997)

Pool action

It is 12 times tougher to walk through water than through air, which is only one reason for the popularity and effectiveness of water aerobics. Another reason for its popularity is that water supports the joints, greatly reducing exercise-related stress. (Self, July 1997)

Sunday and Wednesday evenings throughout November, the 6-lane pool will be used for IM Inner Tube Water Polo. However, the 8-lane pool and diving well will be open for recreational swimming.

PERIODICAL PANACEAS

While a possible budget cut looms, groups develop possible solutions

Library uncertain about costs

▶ HALE LIBRARY WILL USE an electronic document service if the funds can be found.

MATT KREPS
staff writer

K-State renovated the library. K-State dedicated the library. Now, K-State faces the biggest challenge of all — filling the library.

Hale Library will join a growing population of libraries forced by funding and space concerns to rely more on electronic means to supply information to its users.

For K-State, the question is one of cost, said Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries.

"A general mistake that people make is that information is free," he said.

Because the funding is not guaranteed, the move toward electronic information services is not concrete. Hobrock said the the library can only estimate the costs of an electronic information service which is untested at K-State.

In the end, Hobrock said, K-State could be worse off than when it started.

The new library system will include several means of information access, but people will still be able to find books and journals on the shelf.

The library will also include an electronic service called UNCOVER.

UNCOVER is a searchable database and document-delivery service that could access more than 17,000 journals from around the world, said Cynthia McCahon, chair of the Task Force to Plan for Financing the Library of the Twenty-First Century. Currently, the library has access to about 8,000 journals.

If only a few articles are ordered from a periodical in a year, then UNCOVER will save the library money, McCahon said. However, there is no guarantee that it will save money.

Hale can only estimate how many users will convert their print readings to electronic orders on the UNCOVER service, McCahon said. The number of articles users will order is also an estimate.

"Because we chose not to do a trial run like some other universities, we don't know exactly what the conversion rate will be," McCahon said.

Hobrock said the new mix of print and electronic information services is a balanced approach. Hale will use both methods to provide more access for less money, he said.

"We're not advocating everybody switching over. That's why it's called a balanced approach," McCahon said.

The library is using data from other universities to estimate what it will spend on electronic services next year. Hobrock said it could cost as much as $200,000.

"We don't know how this is going to go," he said. "I think everyone agrees it is important to maintain and even improve K-State's printed collection."

Even if costs can be contained and usage is limited, electronic services might not solve the problem, said Michael Ossar, head of the Department of Modern Languages. The service might create inflation among journal and article costs. Moreover, K-State's funding to pay for the new electronic library has not been approved and might not materialize.

Ossar outlined three concerns about switching to electronic document delivery services such as UNCOVER.

First, the library has to make careful

Monograph budget might pay for service

MATT KREPS
staff writer

Hale Library will use its monograph budget to pay for an electronic retrieval service if the service exceeds its $200,000 budget.

If monographs, books and volumes of research that are printed only once, rather than on a regular schedule, are not purchased when they first come out, the library may not get a chance later, said Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries.

"The bottom line is that monographs are the pawn in all of this," Hobrock said.

If funding does not materialize from the three sources the Task Force to Plan for Financing the Library in the Twenty-first Century outlined, the situation could become even worse, Hobrock said. Electronic services would stop, for instance.

The task force recommended increasing library funding by three means — a student privilege fee, increased money from the Kansas Legislature and a $10 million fund-raising campaign through the KSU Foundation.

"If we fail to fund the electronic agenda, we will simply

Discovering UNCOVER

▶ What is UNCOVER?
UNCOVER is an electronic document service. Researchers can order copies of articles from journals their local library does not own.

▶ How will UNCOVER be used?
Faculty and graduate students register with the service. They tell UNCOVER what topics they are interested in, and regular updates of all articles corresponding to their interests are sent to them. Researchers can then order the articles they want to read. UNCOVER can also be searched by keywords. UNCOVER articles are usually delivered by fax within 24 to 48 hours.

▶ Where do UNCOVER articles come from?
UNCOVER sends the order to a university that keeps the printed journal on the shelf. A worker copies the requested article and sends it to the person who placed the order.

▶ What will UNCOVER cost?
The average cost of an UNCOVER article is $16 but can cost as much as $25. Of this, $6 to $20 is a copyright fee the publisher charges.

▶ How does UNCOVER compare to buying printed journals?
An average print subscription in 1997 is $325. About 500 journals cost more than $1,000 a year.

▶ Have other universities used UNCOVER?
Louisiana State University cancelled $28,000 in print subscriptions and spent $22,600 on UNCOVER. Colorado State University spent more than $200,000 between July and October after it lost its entire print collection to a flood.

Library student fee options

The following are proposed options to increase student fees to help fund library periodicals. Presently, full-time undergraduate students pay $273 per semester in fees. All figures are based on fiscal year 1998 enrollment figures.

Task force publishes library solutions, includes new privilege fee to raise funds

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
staff writer

A task force of faculty members searching for solutions to periodical funding problems at Hale Library released its final recommendations late last week.

The Task Force to Plan for Financing the Library of the Twenty-First Century published a 26-page report with recommendations concerning short- and long-term funding solutions, library operation and how to mobilize faculty and administration to fix the shortfall.

Cynthia McCahon, assistant dean of the College of Business Administration and chair of the task force, said the report, which suggests several other sources of revenue for the library, isn't meant to make Hale the No. 1 library in the Big 12. According to task-force statistics, the library is now the worst in the conference.

Instead, more revenue to the library would help make it more comparable to peer institutions' facilities, McCahon said.

"What we're proposing is a definite shot in the arm to get this almost-dead body back to life. It's not just to save what we're going to lose in the current round of journal cuts. This gets us back to some stature," she said.

Design community disagrees about Anderson widening

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

The city's plan to widen Anderson Avenue from four to six lanes has erupted into a mini-debate among special interests.

Even K-State's design community disagrees on the project and its effect on the southern edge of campus and the neighborhood to the south, illustrating the complexity of such an infrastructural undertaking in the heart of a city.

Like the saying goes, depending on whom you ask, you're likely to get a different answer.

Ken Brooks, professor of landscape architecture, said he has no stance on the project but sees the widening as an opportunity for enhancing the university environment.

"It may be possible to increase both vehicular comfort and the sense of pedestrian safety," Brooks said.

Brooks said creating a setback with landscaping between the street and the sidewalk would create a better sense of safety. He said using different materials in the project, like brick for crosswalks, a variety of lighting, trees and shrubs would focus drivers' attention on the street and pedestrian areas.

He said that while the street widening won't increase pedestrians traveling distances, it would increase their exposure to traffic.

"Pedestrians can feel threatened if they aren't given enough time to cross," Brooks said.

He said adding pedestrian islands to the middle of Anderson would allow people more time to completely cross the street.

The Anderson widening is proposed to be, in part, a solution to the bottleneck of traffic on the short strip between Sunset Avenue and 17th Street. The design would "platoon" traffic along, meaning distinct groups of cars would hit all the lights on green and make a smoother passage through the area.

"Faster traffic, by definition, is not necessarily safer traffic for pedestrians," Brooks said.

However, he said the current situation, where drivers are forced around cars holding up traffic to make left-hand turns, is unsafe. He said a stacked lane, like an individual left turn lane, would calm traffic.

Brooks said he sees the desire for a six-lane road as a sign Manhattan is becoming a denser city.

"Campus was laid out when the city was a small village," he said. "It would work fine if the campus had a population of 5,000. This part of campus is a dense urban environment."

While there are supporters of the project in the department of landscape architecture, many faculty members express a sense of outrage about what they perceive to be a project that literally and figuratively splits the campus from the neighborhood to the south.

Rick Forsyth, professor of landscape architecture, said the project would destroy the character of the southern edge of campus, particularly the tree rows and limestone walls.

"It's very short-sighted and wrong-headed to be placing concern on automobile convenience over pedestrian convenience or the quality of the campus," Forsyth said. "Accommodation of more vehicles doesn't solve the traffic problem. It makes it worse."

Forsyth said the character of the south edge of campus is an important part of the university's image.

"The whole campus edge is being eroded away and image-wise, it's a tremendous loss," Forsyth said.

Jerry Carter, director of facilities planning and university architect, has interjected comments on the city's plans throughout the design process.

"I'm happy with the fact the city has been agreeable in providing us with access," Carter said. "The engineers know what we think is needed to occur."

However, Carter said the traffic flow projections have not been discussed in any detail.

Senator proposes alternative for stadium expansion funding

SARA BURDETTE
staff reporter

As the KSU Stadium expansion referendum draws near, K-State students continue to express uncertainty about the creation of a student privilege fee for the expansion.

Engineering Student Sen. Jason Ross offered an alternative for expansion funding to the Privilege Fee Committee on Monday. He said his solution would eliminate many students' concerns.

Ross proposed adding a surcharge of $4.50 to student tickets and $7.25 to alumni tickets. If exactly as many student and alumni season tickets are sold as contractually obligated, privilege fees would not increase, Ross said.

"The biggest advantage of my proposal is students not interested in the games will be all right with this because we put the burden of funding on those using the stadium rather than everyone, as it is set up now," Ross said.

The Privilege Fee Committee and Department of Intercollegiate Athletics have proposed raising privilege fees 50 cents to $1 per student, per credit hour. The fee would be capped at $6 or $12 for full-time students per semester, depending the plan.

Ross said the significant problem with the expansion now is that the money would come from student privilege fees, which affects students who don't attend the games.

"It is not right to bill everyone for something that not everyone is going to use," Ross said.

The athletic department's plan would not allow the privilege fee to be reviewed on a year-to-year basis. However, Ross' proposed plan would add the possibility of changing the fee every year if ticket sales didn't stay the same as contracted.

Privilege Fee Committee Chair Aaron Otto said although it is possible to change a privilege fee every year, it is difficult because it has to go through administration as well as the Kansas Board of Regents.

The committee also continued the discussion on a proposed auditing service. Committee members said the service would help assure that student services are using their fees appropriately. If proposed, the committee will hire a part-time auditor.

"It has two purposes," Otto said. "One is to scare people out of doing something that would be petty, and the second is to uncover something that is happening that isn't supposed to."

Committee member Aaron Truax said he was unsure that all the information found by the auditor would be shared with the committee.

Coordinator of the Office of Student Activities and Services Gayle Spencer said the service was there to help and offer suggestions. She said all information would be given to the committee.

The committee is still working on the proposal and hopes to make a decision by next Monday.

Student coalition plans stadium expansion protest

JOHN HENDERSON
senior staff writer

Students for First Things First met at UFM House on Monday night to ask a few questions.

Why do fliers handed out by the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics this week in the K-State Student Union seem to suggest students are saving money by paying for the expansion of KSU Stadium?

How can Athletic Director Max Urick call for a referendum to fund the expansion of the stadium with student money when the complete plan hasn't been revealed?

How can the athletic department put a price on school pride?

The group was started by six social work classmates talking aloud about the proposed expansion. Rob MacDougall, senior in social work, said it's a coalition without a single leader.

"It was kind of a slow fuse that started burning," MacDougall said. "It kind of coincided with the dedication of Hale Library."

About 10 students attended the meeting, but Vickie Choitz, senior in political science and secondary education, said the list of members who gave input by e-mail numbered close to 30.

Lisa Donaldson, senior in social work, came up with the group's name. She said her meaning of "first things first" was in regard to the library's lack of funds for periodical subscriptions, but the name can have several meanings.

MacDougall said another meaning was the lack of information that students need to make an informed choice. If some of the money is to come from student fees, the department needs to say where the rest will come from, not to mention what the total will be, he said.

"I think the stadium expansion is a great idea," he said. "The problem we have is that there doesn't seem to be any real careful deliberation to come up with a plan in writing by the athletic department."

The meeting was for final approval of the group's own fliers, which MacDougall said it plans to hand out from 10 a.m. until 2 p.m. today through Friday at a table in the Union.

"We basically would have liked to do this the whole week with longer hours," he said, "but we're students with classes and part-time

Collision damages power lines

A two-car collision at 14th Street and Poyntz Avenue damaged power lines and destroyed a school-zone sign Monday afternoon.

"It appears that there might have been a miscalculation in the traffic signal, and the driver went on through," said Patrol Officer Sherri Odell.

Sheryl Slabaugh, senior in kinesiology, and Sara Pfannenstiel, senior in communications sciences and disorders, were in a blue Ford Tempo. They collided with Mark Sears, who was driving a Nissan Truck.

The Tempo spun and hit the power pole on the southeast corner of the intersection.

"They just broke some wires, that's all," said Brent Harper, a KPL worker on the scene. "It looks like the pole's all right."

Both cars sustained heavy damage.

Pfannenstiel sustained minor injuries but refused treatment at the scene.

A lighted school-zone sign was also destroyed in the accident.

Led by sales tax, state revenues $37.5 million above estimates

TOPEKA — State revenues for October amounted to $312 million, which was $37.8 million above estimates made earlier this year, according to the Budget Division.

These figures are the latest good news about the strong Kansas economy.

The biggest single source of income last month was sales tax, amounting to $128.4 million. That was $21.4 million more than anticipated by the division in its March estimate.

Individual income taxes amounted to $116.1 million last month, which was $11.1 million more than estimated by the division.

Other revenues included $20.4 million in use taxes, which was $4.4 million above estimates; $9.4 million in corporate taxes, down $599,000 from estimates; and $4 million in cigarette taxes, down $116,000 from estimates.

Levi Strauss to close 11 plants

SAN FRANCISCO — Its jean sales fading, Levi Strauss & Co. announced Monday it will close 11 of its U.S. plants and lay off 6,400 workers.

The reason for the slump is the competition from designer labels and bargain blues.

The closings at the world's largest brand-name clothing maker will take place in four states: Arkansas, New Mexico, Tennessee and Texas.

The cutbacks, which begin in January, represent one-third of Levi's manufacturing workforce of more than 19,000 in the United States and Canada.

In February, Levi's eliminated 1,000 jobs.

Levi Strauss & Co. had 1996 sales of $7.1 billion, but the privately held company did not release earnings figures.

Truck carrying illegal moonshine crashes, fire kills driver

INWOOD, W.Va. — A pickup truck hauling 200 gallons of moonshine in plastic milk jugs ran off a highway and into a tree, bursting into flames and killing the driver.

The illegal liquor likely fueled the blast and the fire, said Berkeley County sheriff's Lt. K.M. LeMaster.

The driver apparently lost control early Friday on Interstate 81 in West Virginia's Eastern Panhandle, about 90 miles northeast of Washington, D.C.

When police and firefighters reached the scene, moonshine was burning along the highway and in the surrounding grass, said South Berkeley Fire Chief Bruce Chrisman.

The driver had not been identified. The pickup had Virginia license plates.

Klan-costumed teens suspended

CLIFTON FORGE, Va. — Three white students were suspended from Alleghany High School for wearing Ku Klux Klan costumes to school for Halloween.

Principal Phil Douglas said he saw the two brothers and a female friend, ages 13 and 14, shortly after they got off their bus Friday.

"I assumed they were ghosts when I first saw them," Douglas said. "Then I saw the crosses they were wearing."

Students are allowed to wear costumes for Halloween, but they had been told Thursday not to wear anything offensive, Douglas said.

About 17 percent of the school's 870 students are black, Douglas said.

HAVEN OF BAGELS

NEW YORK Bagel

▸ NEW YORK BAGEL CAFE opens in former Dilly's Deli location.

ASHLEY YOULE
staff reporter

Get ready all you bagel lovers. The New York Bagel Cafe is here to tempt your taste buds with flavors from New York.

Having moved in on Anderson Avenue in the old Dilly's Deli location, the New York Bagel Cafe offers a new alternative for breakfast, lunch and dinner.

Rob Geresi, founder of the restaurant, opened the first cafe in 1986 in Stillwater, Okla.

"After we opened in 1986, we had immediate success, so we kept going," Geresi said. "We grew within a 100-mile radius the first five years and opened 50 stores. Now we have 76 stores in 17 states," he said.

Originally from Brooklyn, N.Y., Geresi has been baking bagels since he was 16 years old.

"A friend of mine and I grew up together baking bagels, so we decided to open a bagel cafe. We couldn't think of a better name so we kept the one we have. It's eye-catching, and people seem to really like it," he said.

The New York Bagel Cafe offers a variety of bagel sandwiches on many different kinds of bagels.

"About 60 percent of our sales are done through our deli line, with sandwich choices such as corned beef, turkey, ham or chicken," Geresi said. "Our menu isn't one you see in a typical bagel place. You can have an espresso and a breakfast bagel with sausage, ham and bacon, or you can get a quick bagel and cream cheese. We don't just do the morning thing, though — our lunch and dinner is just as good as our breakfast," he said.

A healthy alternative to fast food, this new restaurant offers low-fat choices such as 99 percent fat-free turkey and bagels with less than one gram of fat.

"Bagels are popular because it's the newest health craze. Everyone knows what a good bagel tastes like, and they appreciate a good one. People love the flavor of New York, and we cater to everybody. When they see our menu, they'll realize that," Geresi said.

With this addition to the restaurant scene in Aggieville, sandwich shops don't feel too threatened by the new cafe.

"I don't think it will affect us that much," Ryan Anderson, employee at Mr. Goodcents and junior in art, said. "I'm looking forward to it. It's someplace different to eat, because you get tired of all the fast food."

Not only will people try it because it's new and a healthy alternative, but many have eaten at its locations in other cities and can't wait to have it right here in Manhattan.

"I'm from Lawrence, and it's something we've needed for a long time," Corry White, employee at Subway and sophomore in elementary education, said. "I think people might go there to try it because they're curious, and we might lose business to that, but I don't think it will affect us that much."

Geresi is excited about the new location, and he wants people to know that not only are flavor and quality important to the new cafe, but so is customer service.

"When you have too many stores, your service slips. That's why we don't have 300 stores. We make sure the service is ingrained in our employees. From the beginning we have that nailed down," he said.

The New York Bagel Cafe is still accepting applications. "We've hired some employees, but we'd love people to come by and apply. We can never have too much help," Geresi said.

The hours of the New York Bagel Cafe are from 7 a.m. to 8 p.m. Monday through Saturday. They are open Sunday from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Chris Hansen appears on cover of leadership magazine

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
staff writer

Six weeks ago, Interfraternity Council External Vice President Chris Hansen got a phone call.

Numerous interviews and a photo shoot later, his face appeared on the cover of fall issue of "Student Leader" magazine. Nearly 900 colleges and universities throughout the country subscribe to the publication.

Hansen, who was last year's student body president, said he was surprised when he learned that the executive director of his fraternity, Theta Xi, had nominated him for a spot on the magazine's cover.

"They looked over all of the nominations and called for a phone interview with me as one of the finalists. Two weeks later, they called me back and told me that I had been selected for the cover," he said.

Hansen, senior in nuclear engineering, said he was even more surprised when he learned that he had been chosen for the cover story.

"I was surprised when they called the first time and told me that I had been nominated. But then, when she called back and told me I was going to be on the cover, I was just like, 'Wow,'" Hansen said.

The page-seven article featuring Hansen was titled "Facing Conflict Head-On: How to handle trouble without blowing your cool." In the article, Hansen explained his tactics for dealing with problems during his positions as Theta Xi president and student body president.

In the article, Hansen said that being president of his fraternity during his sophomore year was more difficult than representing K-State's student body last year.

"As student body president, you're making decisions about millions of dollars. In a fraternity, being an officer forces you to confront issues that you might not face somewhere else," he said. "The frat helps you understand that you just can't walk away when a guy is drinking too much or isn't doing well in class."

Hansen said it is essential to make all sides of an issue or debate feel included.

"The key is to bring lots of different ideas and perspectives to bear," he said in the magazine.

Students, teachers suffer from money-related hiring freeze

If you have tried to enroll lately, you might have noticed the line schedule has made a liar out of the course catalog. Classes that should be there are not, and it's not just obscure little things, either. Prerequisites for the rest of the curriculum, like Expository Writing II and College Algebra, are being slashed for a lack of instructors.

"What's going on?" you cry. "Have the professors gotten better deals? Have the graduate students graduated?"

No, sorry. It boils down to that root of all evil: money.

There's been a hiring freeze. There are no new professors and no money to hire graduate students to fill in for them. The extra money is going to be used to buy technology for the classrooms. Someday, every building will be outfitted like the lecture hall in Umberger Hall. Computers and interactive media will be used to help teach many subjects. This should make the learning process easier and more engaging.

It's a beautiful dream, wouldn't you say?

The reality is that fewer teachers today means larger classes, overworked professors and seniors trying to take Expository Writing II because they couldn't get into it as sophomores. It also means less individual attention per student.

Professors will be getting equipment they are not qualified to use, and everyone will suffer. The simple fact is that all the technology in the world won't make up for a lack of instructors.

There are no simple answers to this problem. The money has to come from somewhere, and the provost made what he felt was the kindest cut. Unfortunately, he did it with little input from the people it affects the most: faculty and students.

This decision needs to be reexamined with the input of Faculty Senate. Perhaps more minds thinking about the problem can find an easier solution for everyone.

Leaky roofers, flaky roofers

VIEWPOINT

CHRISTOPHER McLEMORE

CHRIS McLEMORE is a sophomore in political science and speech. You can send e-mail to Chris at clm1182@ksu.edu

Author's note: The Tom Egan II, owner and operator of Tom Egan II Roofing Inc. from Salina, Kan., mentioned in this column is not the Tom Egan II, owner and operator of Tom Egan II Roofing Inc. from Salina, Kan. who is working on my apartment. Any similarities are purely coincidental. Thank you.

Last Saturday God opened up the skies, and it rained.

Sunday morning the sun rose, and outside the rain subsided.

In my apartment, the rain still came.

God had frowned on me.

As I sat on my water-logged couch, brown tea-like water pouring in all around me, I raised my voice over the sound of my roommate building an ark in the kitchen, and I called out, asking who had brought the flood to my humble abode.

My answer came by way of a 1997 Ford Mustang convertible with leather interior, compact-disc player and tilt/cruise. It was Tom Egan II — roofing contractor, family man, total enemy.

Tom Egan II and his cronies (I'd call them "workers," but then I'd be lying) began working on the complex many weeks ago, and my life has not been the same since. Before Egan's men invaded my existence, my attitude remained indifferent. After they arrived, my attitude quickly became one of irritability.

After a mere few days of "work," our apartment complex looked like Berlin 1945. Thankfully, the battlegrounds were clearly marked. A large plywood scrap warned all that were to visit. In large spray-painted letters read the following: "Be carful. Get our atention before entring." Apparently, Spelling 101 is an elective at roofing school.

From there, the problems just got worse. After a "worker" began sweeping the ground at 8 a.m. with a metal snow shovel, I had to question the overall legitimacy of the work. I thought the sound of metal on concrete was bad (imagine listening to an a capella version of John Tesh singing "We are the World," while choruses of vixens run their fingernails down a huge black chalkboard), but this was to be the least of my worries.

The fellow then climbed to the roof and casually tossed the shovel off. Waking up to a 1965 Sears-model snow shovel breaking the glass in my window was certainly perplexing to me, but the "workers" didn't seem to think it was abnormal. They acted as if lobbing a shovel off the roof was perfectly all right, like it belonged in a Norman Rockwell painting or something.

This was not becoming a comforting situation, to say the least.

After the shovel incident, items continued to fall from the roof. Now you'd think that because they work on roofs often (hence the whole "Roofing Inc." on the side of their truck), they would know to be cautious.

Think again.

One of my neighbors was very disappointed to find that the shirtless gentleman running around the complex had thrown a roll of tar paper onto the hood of her car. Everyone should understand how easy it is to accidentally chuck a 50-pound roll of tar paper off a roof.

Certainly a common mistake. A mistake that crushed the car's hood, cracked the windshield and created various other problems to the engine.

Can anyone say, "job opening?"

Luckily, Tom paid us a visit to let us know that he "regretted the problem" (which didn't make me feel much better) and that he was "on the job" (another comforting thought). Since that visit, the roof has leaked a few more gallons of water, the ceiling has developed a canopy effect and the carpet has produced a smell that knocks visitors unconscious upon entering.

It's pretty bad when you have to keep smelling salts by the front door. This leads me to believe you should never trust people to do something when it isn't in their best interest. Tom certainly feels no urgent motivation to repair my apartment.

I wasn't expecting to see Niagara Falls when I got home last Saturday, so the whole issue surprised me. If only I would have had a barrel. The problem has gotten worse since day one and Tom Egan II has just reaffirmed my belief that people are self-centered and greedy.

I hope it won't take a canoe to get to the bathroom for very much longer — my aquatic days are probably numbered. I'm sure that soon Tom Egan II will have a change of heart and repair the apartment.

After all, folks, he's "on the job."

Law breaking, AMERICAN STYLE

UNITED STATES FINDS LOOPHOLES IN CHILDREN'S RIGHTS

VIEWPOINT

JONATHAN WINKLER

JONATHAN WINKLER is a senior in physics. You can send e-mail to Jonathan at jnw@ksu.edu

We don't ordinarily think of the United States — the "mother country" for many of us — as a lawbreaker. However, among the larger community of nations, it has become extraordinarily clever in avoiding the need to conform to international standards of morality.

It does this by refusing to sign human-rights and weapons-control treaties (especially those regulating use of nerve gases and other results of "Better Warfare Through Chemistry" research). By signing those treaties only with qualifying reservations, which bind it to complying with the terms of the treaty at the federal level only; or by signing but refusing to honor the provisions unless they are enabled by laws which may or may not be passed at the federal, state and local level.

Cynthia Price Cohen, who will be on campus tonight at 7:30 to deliver a Lou Douglas Lecture in Umberger 105, has had ample opportunity to observe the duplicity of the American government. She participated in the drafting of the U.N. Convention on the Rights of the Child for six years, until the finished document was approved by the United Nations in 1989, and has been pleading for its ratification by the United States ever since.

There are no constitutional obstacles to adopting this convention; Article II, Section 2 of the U.S. Constitution provides that the president shall negotiate treaties that will become the "Supreme Law of the Land" when ratified by the Senate, which means the terms of the treaty supersede all federal and state laws — the "reserved powers" clause (Amendment 10) that guarantees states' rights does not apply to foreign treaties.

Nor are there any compelling humanitarian reasons not to ratify — quite the opposite, in fact. Its 54 articles contain guarantees that children in signatory countries will be fed, clothed, sheltered, protected from exploitation and educated, and that all judicial proceedings in which they are involved (such as custody proceedings) will be conducted according to their best interests. Much of this has been pioneered in the United States.

In 1879, a child in the state of New York sued to be removed from her abusive parents, the first lawsuit of its kind in the world (although, the American Civil Liberties Union then being unavailable, her legal representation was paid for by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals).

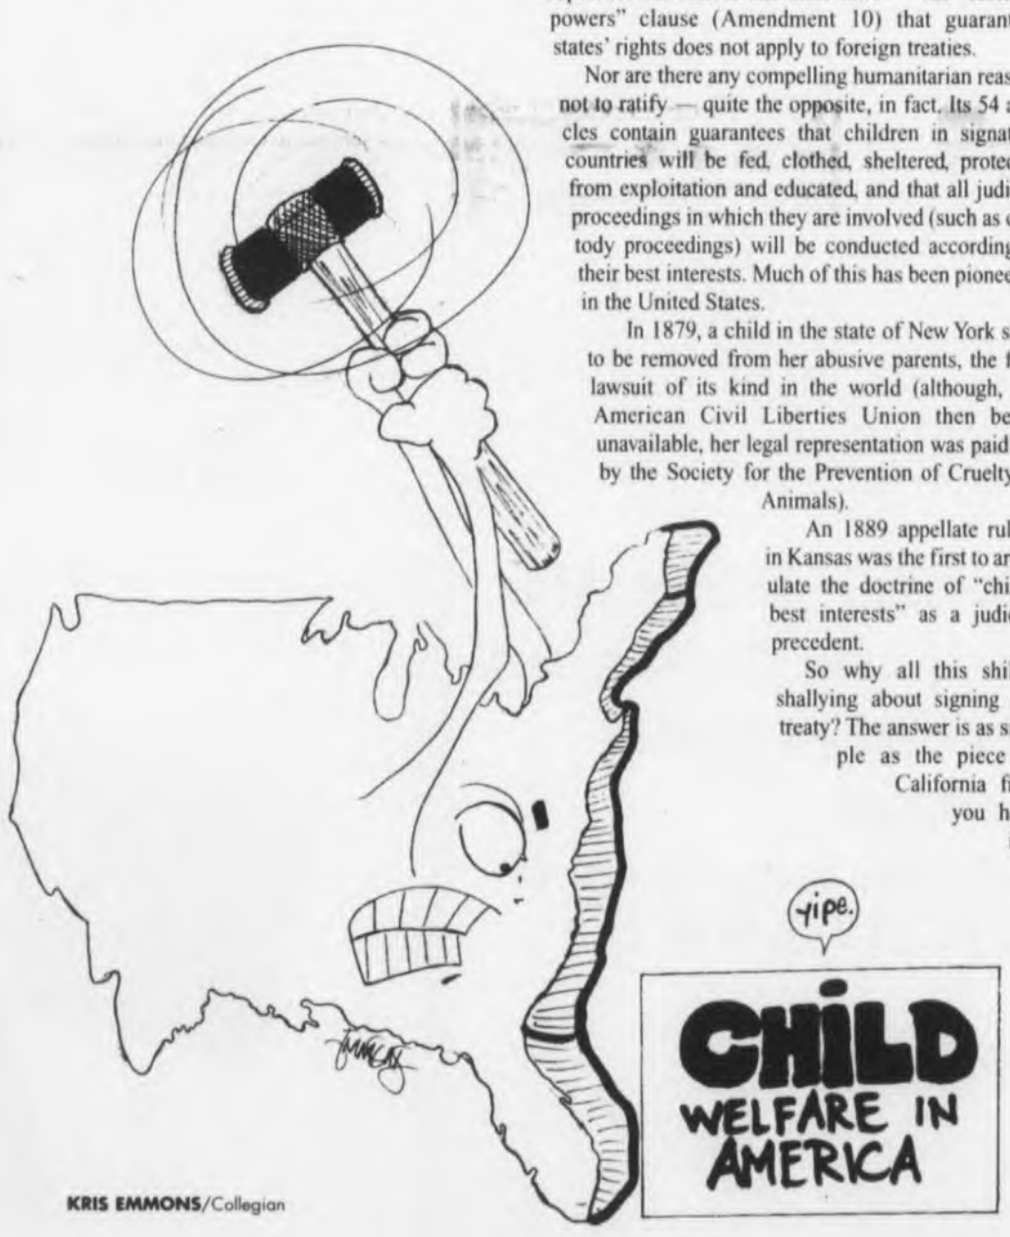
An 1889 appellate ruling in Kansas was the first to articulate the doctrine of "child's best interests" as a judicial precedent.

So why all this shilly-shallying about signing the treaty? The answer is as simple as the piece of California fruit you hold in your hand and as ugly as the working conditions of the person who picked it. Article 32 of the convention requires all signatory states to guarantee that children within their borders, regardless of nationality, will not be economically exploited or forced to do work inimical to their moral, physical or intellectual development.

If the convention were ratified, this provision would require the state of California to crack down upon undocumented migrant laborers, almost none of whom are American citizens, many of whom are children, and all of whom are essential to bring in the fruit and vegetable harvests which make California the nation's largest agricultural producer.

Federal immigration law and its enforcement are configured so that while it is technically illegal to hire undocumented laborers, especially at the appalling wages these people are normally paid, nothing prevents San Fernando Valley truck farmers from claiming that their fruits and vegetables magically fell off the trees or jumped out of the ground and into bushels ready for transportation to market.

Similarly, Los Angeles sweatshop owners can claim the dresses and shoes they send to department stores appeared out of nowhere by the same means.



Continuing these practices after the treaty is signed, however, would put the United States in violation of international law as well as its own (unenforced) fair-employment regulations. This would upset free-trade negotiations and lead to other deleterious diplomatic consequences.

So not signing the treaty is the first line of defense. The second line is to discuss signing it, but with a qualifying federal reservation, which makes its terms applicable to the federal government and any territories (such as American Guam, the Virgin Islands, etc.) where it has primary jurisdiction, and to the individual states "at their discretion." This means they can ignore it if the garment industry wants to, or the fruit farmers have a harvest to get in.

The third line of defense is to declare that none of the articles of the Convention are self-enabling, which means that the United States signs it, but no part of it has force until we write laws specifically to enable it. Then the United States forgets about writing the enabling legislation and hopes international observers don't notice.

We are too proud a country to hide our shameful use of child labor using the same sophisticated techniques employed by tax evaders and dishonest contractors. The development of mechanical ways of picking fruit and stitching together shoes and clothes should preoccupy us, rather than the search for under-the-table ways of continuing to use children for those tasks.

One way or another, we should wholeheartedly ratify each and every article of the convention, stipulating that it is self-enabling without federal reservations of any kind, because investing in the social and educational development of our large immigrant population — whose mean age is lower than the rest of the country — is key to keeping America an economic powerhouse long after today's workers and entrepreneurs have retired and died.

Pedestrians take a back seat to road widening

Editor,

Let me see if I understand this. The city can dig away 45 feet of the hill on the south side of campus, dig trenches to bury the overhead wires, pull up 180 trees and dig holes to plant 240 more, but can't figure out how to put in an underpass to protect pedestrians trying to get across their new street. You've got to be kidding.

But then again, these are the same people who spent all that money widening the intersection at 11th Street and Bluemont Avenue and still didn't put in a left-turn signal, and who can't figure out how to time the lights at Third Street and Tuttle Creek Boulevard so they don't create a permanent traffic jam.

Let's face it — pedestrians didn't figure in at all when there was a pot of money to spend and a university's need to justify eliminating the playing field south of Memorial Stadium and the building of a new parking garage, while they continue to ignore the idea of a shuttle service to outlying parking lots.

By the way, Jack Messer, tearing down the homes, driving people out and then sticking in a few trees does not create a community garden.

Questions regarding expansion unanswered

Editor,

I did some calculating this weekend, and I now have a question regarding the use of revenue from ticket sales.

According to my calculations, if students vote for an additional 10,000 seats at KSU Stadium, this means possibly an additional $2 million in ticket sales each season. The proposed plan is that students would pay off the loan for the expansion with an increase in fee, which would equal more than $750,000 each year.

Has anyone mentioned how long this fee increase would last (20-year loan?) and what will be done with the additional ticket sales revenue? Has anyone suggested allocating the additional revenues to the library so all students benefit from this proposed increase?

From my calculations, we are talking possibly about $15 million from a tuition increase and another $40 million at least from additional revenue in a 20-year period if season ticket prices remain exactly the same. Where is all the money going?

Portion of campus should be closed off to traffic

Editor,

There is a problem on this campus that needs to be addressed. It happens every Monday, Wednesday and Friday at 12:30 p.m. I walk out of Bluemont Hall only to find a miniature war taking place at the crosswalk on Mid Campus Drive.

Cars are trying to edge their way through the crosswalk while pedestrians continue to cross in a frantic rush. I feel this is dangerous and some type of action needs to be taken.

I can remember last year when Mid Campus Drive was closed because of the reconstruction of the library. At that time, the congestion of traffic was at a minimum, and students could walk in peace.

This is, in fact, a college campus where students and faculty roam by foot a majority of the time. A perfect solution to this problem would be to close at least a portion of the campus to unnecessary traffic.

This would not only reduce campus traffic, but it would also make our campus a safe place for pedestrians as well.

Students should vote 'no,' avoid paying for stadium

Editor,

For the past few weeks, I have been reading the editorials, articles and advertisements in the Collegian about the football stadium expansion. The issue I am most concerned with, and I feel has not been addressed, is what students are going to pay and what they are going to get in return.

Considering adoption of "Plan 2" expansion, a student who buys football season tickets will be paying $120 a year to athletics. This includes $60 for the tickets, $24 for the expansion fee and about $18 a semester for the regular athletics fee.

The grand total in student fees for a full-time student will be $526. This seems like an awful lot of money to get 529 more seats than we had this year.

I know the stadium needs to be and will be expanded, but we shouldn't tax ourselves to do it. The best way to make sure you won't have to pay for the expansion with student fees is to vote "no" on the campus wide referendum Nov. 17 and 18 in the K-State Student Union.

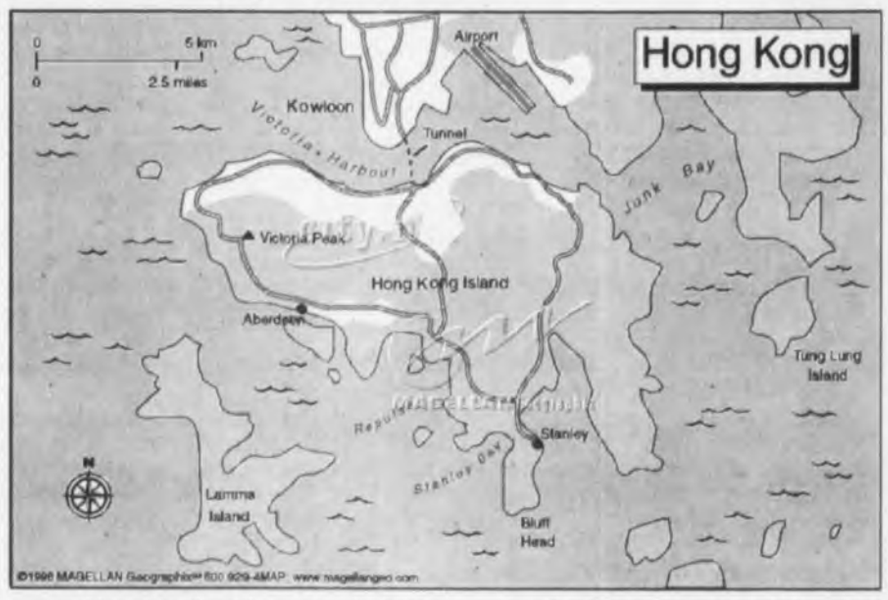
A BUSY street in Hong Kong is crowded with a wide array of signs.

KEVYN JACOBS
special to the Collegian

Only two days after we left Shanghai, we arrived in Hong Kong on Oct. 11. Our port stops are coming fast and furious now, with little on-ship time in between to study or prepare for the next stop.

Fortunately, we'll get a break on the long stretch between Vietnam and India, but that's still a couple of weeks away. Many of the students on ship are beginning to feel the stress of adjusting to a rapid-fire series of cultures and countries and trying to cram a lot of learning and studying into the few days we are on the Universe Explorer. But we're coping and are thoroughly enjoying ourselves while we do it.



Our arrival in Hong Kong was a little disappointing. It was incredibly smoggy as we arrived, obscuring the spectacular skyline of Hong Kong Island against its backdrop of mountains. The entire time we were in port, it was smoggy, humid and hot.

Like Japan, Hong Kong island is mountainous, and the dense urban area is squeezed into the narrow strip of land between mountain and sea. Our ship docked at the Ocean Terminal shopping mall in Kowloon, giving us an incredible view of the Hong Kong Island skyline at night.

Travel across the harbor can be accomplished by means of a subway and an automobile tunnel which runs under the harbor, or by crossing on the Star Ferry line, which has served Hong Kong for more than a hundred years. The ferry is definitely the most fun way to cross and the cheapest.

I had always heard that Hong Kong was a place shoppers loved to go. Little did I know how true this would turn out to be. When I walked off the ship, I walked into a mall. Literally, we were docked at a mall.

Hong Kong's reputation of being a place to get good bargains turned out to be a little less than accurate. Even though the U.S. dollar is strong to the Hong Kong dollar (the exchange rate was $7.8 Hong Kong = $1 U.S. while we were there), after you figure out the exchange, it turns out everything costs about the same as in the states. You certainly can bargain and haggle, but usually it only brings you to an amount similar to that in the United States.

The handover of Hong Kong from Britain to China on July 1 of this year seems to have had little effect on the city. With the exception of the occasional Chinese flag flying in places, it's pretty much business as usual here. Apparently, the Chinese government has decided to let Hong Kong pretty much run itself as it always has. Travel to and from Hong Kong and the rest of China is restricted, though, to keep millions of Chinese from flooding into the freedom and wealth of Hong Kong.

Business is flourishing here, and cautious optimism seems to be the philosophy of the residents of Hong Kong. Many of the Hong Kong expatriates who left for Canada, Australia and Britain in the years leading up to the changeover are even returning home now, more confident that they will be allowed to continue to live their lives pretty much as they always have.

But the British influence on Hong Kong is still evident. Many streets have English names, and most signs are both in English and Cantonese. English is also commonly spoken, and English-speaking foreigners have little difficulty in navigating around the city.

As I mentioned earlier, I was a little disappointed in my experience in Hong Kong, simply because it's so westernized and so commercial, even more so than Japan. A lot of students compared the ambiance of Hong Kong to New York, being very cosmopolitan and with a lot of places to shop. There really aren't a lot of cultural or historic places to visit in Hong Kong, but given that this is the economic hub of Asia, I guess that's to be expected.

In fact, my most interesting cultural experience at this stop was when I left the city on the ferry to go visit Lantau island. Lantau is twice the size of Hong Kong island, yet has only a tiny fraction of the population. Most of the island has been preserved as a park and is absolutely beautiful. Lush tropical jungles, winding roads through the mountains, and tiny fishing villages composed of houses built on stilts above the water all contribute to the charm on this getaway.

Lantau is home to one of the most unusual examples of wildlife I have ever seen: A large population of wild cows. I'm so used to the idea of domesticated cows, I've never even thought about what wild cows might be like. But driving along the roads on Lantau, you pass the occasional undomesticated bovine grazing at the side of the road. They roam free on the island and are actually pretty aggressive if humans get too close.

While on Lantau, I visited the Po Lin Buddhist monastery. After a delicious vegetarian meal at the monastery, we visited the world's largest free-standing outdoor bronze Buddha.

It's a long, 16-story climb up to the Buddha and inside there is a shrine containing relics, said to be fragments of bone from the Buddha himself.

Finally, on the night of Oct. 14, we sailed away from Hong Kong, leaving behind the city that, more than anything else, epitomizes the future of Asia. And I'm not sure I like what I saw in that future.

Bye bye, Hong Kong.
Next stop: Vietnam!

Jars of Clay mixes Christian, secular for a winner

MATT KREPS
staff writer

Jars of Clay's latest release, "Much Afraid," continues the band's drive for recognition as a Christian rock band in a sea of secular music.

Music Review

The band's melodic pop-rock style reflects its British influence from greats such as Genesis and Sting. The band also credits mega-stars Def Leppard and ABBA for its inspiration.

Jars of Clay appeals to more than just Christian fans. The band's 1995 self-titled debut, which yielded the single and video "Flood," went platinum. This release promises to continue its successful trek through the music industry.

"Much Afraid" is a personal search for love and safety in a fear-filled world. The title track's soulful melody and haunting lyrics talk of emptiness without Christ. By carrying their problems to their religion, the band members find the strength to go on.

"So I lay at Your feet all my brokenness, I carry all of my burdens to You," the group proclaims in the first verse.

The album leads with the fast-paced "Overjoyed." The tempo kicks off to a good pace and picks up through the song.

"Fade to Grey" slows the pace to a searching melody. The song displays a rare talent for accentuating vocals with reflective music. In this case, the swells and falls of the keyboard do more to carry the audience than the words.

"Tea and Sympathy" is a lilting melody about trading love for sympathy when things go badly.

The fifth track, "Frail," is something of a sore thumb for the band. Its 90-second instrumental introduction failed to grab my interest. I was ready to push the forward button before the lyrics began.

"Five Candles" puts the band back on track with a questioning song about presence without love.

The band marches on with "Weighed Down." This track asks if a king can be weighed down by the world. The band says "yes" in Christ's case. The lyrics tell the listeners Christ is waiting to take their burdens and replace them with love.

The band's next track, "Truce," brings in a street rock influence with a techno introduction and a sudden burst of energy in the first chorus. While not hard-hitting, the work promises to become a favorite with the true fans.

Jars of Clay returns to its solid Christian roots with the last two songs. "Much Afraid" closes the band's interpretive numbers with its haunting questions of security.

The group leaves the listener reassured with its exciting "Hymn." This is anything but the traditional church hymn. It has a rock melody and distinctive tempo. It's a song of dedication and security in the band's faith. With more traditional Christian rock lyrics, it is the only song on the album with a readily evident message.

"Much Afraid" offers new ground in the world of Christian rock. Jars of Clay continues its successful mix of soft melodies found in Christian rock's roots with more exciting melodies from the pop movement.

If this band continues to mature, there could be more great things to come as Jars of Clay secures its own calmer place in the busy world of rock 'n' roll.

Cross country teams disappointed in Big 12 Championship results

JOEL WHITE
staff writer

The K-State cross country teams finished in the bottom half of the conference as the women placed seventh and the men placed ninth last Saturday in the Big 12 Championship at Stillwater, Okla.

Head coach Randy Cole said neither team lived up to its potential.

"We did not place as high as we had hoped for," he said. "As a group, we did not rise to the occasion."

The K-State women finished behind Colorado, Nebraska, Missouri, Baylor, Texas Tech and Texas. Colorado won the women's division with 23 points. K-State finished with 177 points.

The K-State women had some high points in the 5,000-meter race.

Freshman Annie Wetterhus raced to a 12th-place finish with a time of 18 minutes, three seconds, which was three seconds out of the top 10. She was third among all freshmen in the race.

Sophomore Emily Diederich, a middle distance runner, showed that she can also run distance races. She placed 33rd with a time of 18:56.

Ashlie Kinton finished in 43rd place; Kelly Andra finished 46th; and Alison Canny's 50th-place finish rounded out the third through fifth spots for the Wildcats.

The K-State men placed ahead of Baylor, Texas Tech and Oklahoma on the 8,000-meter course. The Colorado men made it a sweep as they won the trophy with 32 points. K-State finished with 224 points.

Cole said the K-State men had a couple of bright spots.

"Justin Wrigley and Brent Stover ran tough for themselves in trying to rally their teammates," he said.

Stover, a junior, was the third-highest finisher for the Wildcats. He placed 44th with a time of 26:12.

Stover said he knew he had to pick up the slack for the team's subpar performance in the first part of the race.

"I felt like I was running pretty strong," he said. "I got up by (Brandon) Jessop and we worked together for the last mile."

Freshman Brandon Jessop ran a time of 26:05, making him the Wildcats' top finisher at 38th place.

Senior Zach Davies held off Stover to finish two seconds behind Jessop in 42nd place.

The fourth-highest Wildcat finisher, Wrigley, placed 52nd with a time of 26:39.

Though he was the fourth-fastest Wildcat, Wrigley might have had the best performance on the team. He wasn't expected to compete as well as he did after being hampered by injuries during the season.

"Wrigley really came through well," Stover said. "We all figured going into the race that he wasn't going to be 100 percent, but he ran with a lot of guts."

Andy Pelsma, a freshman, rounded out the Wildcats' top five with a 61st-place finish in 27:10.

Stover said he had hoped the Wildcats would finish in the top six or seven, but the team didn't have what it took on Saturday.

"It gave us a chance to see just how tough the conference is, and we have a lot of work to do," he said.

K-State tennis team enters break after successful Rolex Regionals

DAN MERKER
assistant sports editor

The K-State tennis team could be compared to a bowling team this weekend at the Rolex Regionals in Omaha, Neb. The team was on a roll, knocking down almost everyone in its path.

Lena Piliptchak had a first-round match against No. 4 seed Ana Friganovic of New Mexico and dispatched the nationally ranked player 6-3, 7-6. In the second round, she beat Bettina Pieri of Boise State 6-4, 6-0, moving her on to the quarterfinals. In the quarters, Piliptchak's winning streak ended with a 6-4, 6-1 loss to Adrien Jenkins of Brigham Young.

"Lena played extremely well. Given the way she has played in the last two tournaments, I wasn't surprised," head coach Steve Bietau said. "This was the best singles win of her career and just continues her great fall season."

Yana Dorodnova entered the tournament as the No. 5 seed, and had two straight-set wins to advance to the quarterfinals, where she was edged out 6-2, 3-6, 7-5 by Anna Svedenov of Utah.

"Yana continued to play well in the regionals," Bietau said. "She has had probably the best performances of her career this fall."

Anna Pampoulova's story was the same as Piliptchak's and Dorodnova's. She took her first two matches before losing in the quarters. Like Piliptchak, she lost to BYU player Eline Chiew by a 6-3, 6-1 score.

Eva Novotna and Dinah Watson both lost their first-round matches. Novotna lost her consolation match, while Watson won her next match before being knocked out of the consolation draw in a third-set tie-break by Julia Sidorova of Kansas.

K-State's top doubles team of Dorodnova and Novotna, the tournament's No. 3 seed, advanced all the way to the semifinals of the doubles' draw. The two had a first-round bye before beating Andrea Montoya and Monica Poveda of Tulsa by an 8-4 score in the second round and Colorado's Sandra Fischer and Jessica Gartow 8-5 in the quarters.

Again, BYU was the squad that stopped the Wildcats. Chiew and Jenkins stopped Dorodnova and Novotna's championship hopes with an 8-6 win to move on to the finals and send the Cats home.

Bietau said he was happy with the way his team played.

"Yana and Eva consistently prove that they are a team to be dealt with," Bietau said. "They played outstanding in this tournament."

The Rolex Regionals was the final tournament of the fall for the Cats. They will begin the spring season on Jan. 25 with a home match against Southwest Missouri State.

K-STATE DEFENSIVE BACK Cephus Scott celebrates at the end of the OU game. K-State defeated OU 26-7 in Oklahoma on Oct. 25.

Secondary first-rate

Wildcat backfield steps it up versus Texas Tech

SUN DEE MILLS
sports editor

Until now, the K-State defense has battled teams that ran tough running attacks — Ohio, Nebraska, Missouri and Texas A&M, to name a few.

But this weekend, the Wildcats met Texas Tech quarterback Zebbie Lethridge and receivers Donnie Hart and Malcom McKenzie, which was a true test of the Cats' secondary.

McKenzie ranks 33rd in the nation and first in the Big 12 in receptions per game and has caught 37 passes for 378 yards.

Hart has already had three of Tech's top-six single-game reception yardage games in school history. Currently suffering from a hamstring pull, Hart didn't play against Nebraska or Texas A&M, and he dropped out of the national rankings.

This season, Hart has been tied for ninth in the nation for receptions per game with 7.40 and was seventh in the nation in reception yardage with an 112.80 average.

"We knew Hart was going to come out and try hard, even though he had that hamstring pull," senior cornerback Demetric Denmark said.

And the K-State secondary was prepared for a tough passing game. Hart and McKenzie only caught a combined four passes for a total of 39 yards.

"The defense did a great job," Denmark said. "Those receivers are supposed to be all legitimate with 37 catches between them. I guess they're the best of the Big 12."

Defensive coordinator Mike Stoops said the Cat defense's ability to contain Lethridge was key to the secondary's success.

"Zebbie's a lot like Michael (Bishop, Cat quarterback)," Stoops said. "They did a good job keeping him confined and not letting him scramble."

The pressure Lethridge endured at the hands of the Cat defense limited him to eight of 27 completions for 64 yards, with his longest pass reaching 15 yards.

"The defense put pressure on Zebbie," Denmark said. "It made our job a lot easier."

Coach Bill Snyder said he was satisfied with his cornerbacks' efforts.

"Denmark and (Dyshod) Carter played with confidence," Snyder said. "They definitely caused Zebbie to hold the ball more. It can take eight to nine seconds to run him down."

As far as the Tech game being a breakout performance for the secondary, Denmark agreed.

"It kind of was," Denmark said. "We just had to bone up and play like we know how to play."

In the past, K-State has traditionally had a strong secondary, with All-American New England Patriots' cornerback Chris Canty as an anchor for the past three years. Cornerback Joe Gordon, free safety Mario Smith and Kansas City Chief cornerback Clyde Johnson graduated last spring, while Canty made himself eligible for the NFL draft, which left many starting positions open.

Of this season's defensive backs, only Denmark and strong safety Monty Spiller are seniors. The youth of the group was a cause for concern earlier in the season, but Stoops said it's coming along just fine.

"They're young, but they're gaining experience and getting maturity that they need on the field," Stoops said.

With one passing-oriented team in their pocket, Denmark said the secondary was ready for more.

"It's great to get a game against a passing team under our belt," Denmark said. "We have a great secondary, but we don't always get the credit."

'Big 12 Showcase' makes stop at K-State campus

SAM SACKETT/Collegian

SUN DEE MILLS, senior in electronic journalism and Collegian sports editor, talks with Heidi Evert of KTMJ-TV from Junction City. Mills was chosen from 20 K-State applicants to be a co-host of the Gatorade "Big 12 Showcase" segment about K-State.

OK, so maybe the picture makes it look like my dream of becoming a sports reporter has quickly come to pass. However, don't let the photo deceive you. What I did Monday was much bigger than just covering a K-State sport. I showed the nation what K-State's all about through my eyes.

OK, maybe not the whole nation. But people within the Fox Rocky Mountain Sports and the Fox Southwest Sports viewing regions can see the "Big 12 Showcase" three times a week. Heck, Mike, the host of the Gatorade Hummer Tour '97 segment, said he even caught the show in a sports bar that offered Fox Sports West. So it's close.

This was not an easy task. So much to show, and only seven hours to do it. How could I be sure I wasn't going to forget anything?

Fox and Gatorade jointly chose a campus representative to be a co-host of the segment with Mike, and I was the lucky chosen one.

We were to show action on campus and around Manhattan and what's unusual about K-State. The "Big 12 Showcase" has a two-minute segment spotlighting one Big 12 campus each week. Because the Kansas/K-State football game is this week, Fox Sports thought it was the best time to visit our campus.

Fox staff members didn't account for the 40-degree, blustery, 20 mph wind that comes with a Kansas November day. When I suggested the scheduling team should visit the northern schools in August and September and save the Texas schools for last, Jeff, the Gatorade spokesman along for the day, acknowledged it was a good idea.

I was to meet Jeff, Mike and Jason, the guy who drives the Gatorade Hummer across the Midwest, at 9 a.m. to begin filming. Jason was going to film most of the day with a small, High-8 camera that would give an MTV-feel to the segment. A Fox crew was supposed to come in the afternoon to film the rest.

All decked out in purple pride, I arrived to find the segment was sponsored by Champion and my warm, cozy K-State pullover with the Starter logos on it would have to be hidden. No problem. They said they could shoot around it.

We first went to the K-State Student Union, since it was early and many students were still snuggled in bed. The Union was quiet, but we wandered downstairs to the bowling alley and pounced on video games. I soon discovered why I do not play sports. I have no hand-eye coordination.

I was mutilated by morphs, shot at by cyborgs and Mike — I lost every game miserably. But it was fun, and the thought of being humiliated on television by my poor video game skills took a backseat.

I'd told the crew 10:20 a.m. was the busiest time on campus, with many students changing classes. We corralled people into talking about bowl game possibilities, doing the "K-S-U" chant and singing the fight song, pretty admirable tasks for the early hour.

After shooting that footage, Jeff decided Powercat stickers would cover the Starter logos on my jacket and we went into the K-State Union Bookstore. The bookstore sold Champion gear, and I am now the proud owner of a new K-State Champion pullover. Much better than stickers.

We went and shot some more campus pictures and decided it was lunchtime. When we went to the Gatorade Hummer, two friendly Parking Services employees (yes, they exist) were walking by. We asked them if we could film them ticketing the attention-getting Hummer, and because the meter had run out, they almost did.

After lunch, the Fox Sports crew was to meet us at KSU Stadium with the show's host, Bill Land, for more action filming with the powerlifting team and the women's and men's rugby teams. But before that, we were to play football in the grass by the free-speech zone with Willie the Wildcat.

Now, I'm not going to pretend I can throw a football without making the ball sail end-over-end slowly through the air. And that's exactly what I did. But we got some cooperative students who could throw the ball to play along, and the footage of Willie and Mike tackling each other in the middle of campus will be pretty funny. Willie's got a mean Deion dance and a mean motorcycle.

Next, we were off to Wagner Field to meet the Fox people. They were late, and Jeff, Mike and I were all interviewed by KTMJ-TV, the Fox affiliate in Junction City, in the meantime (hence the picture). When they showed, Mike and I were bundled in the stadium's seats in the shade, and together our body temperature was probably about 12 degrees. We quickly shot an intro and an exit shot with the Fox crew sans Land and went to the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex to meet the powerlifting team.

Boy, do I feel like a slacker! These guys and gals could have lifted three of me. And the worst was when I had to ask exactly where the women's locker room was — I used the excuse that when I came to the Rec Complex (maybe three times in the past two years), I was all ready to work out.

But the crowning moment of the day had to be playing rugby with the women's rugby team. I have a new respect for this little-known game, simply because it's like football without pads. I'm too much of a wimp to play football with a double amount of pads. So the people who not only want to, but love to subject themselves to being run over, stepped on and tackled with no more protection than a mouthpiece are to be admired.

All in all, the day was long and tiring, but definitely worth the lasting soreness and the suffering Spanish grade. We did many other things, but this is one of the most memorable. Who knows what will end up in the final cut, but the two minutes you'll see only skims the surface of what's cool about K-State.

▶ "Big 12 Showcase" with the K-State segment will air at mid night Wednesday, 5:30 p.m. Friday and 8 a.m. Saturday on Fox Rocky Mountain Sports, TCI Channel 38.

The proposal includes short-term funding recommendations, such as a $100,000 contribution from all university cost centers in 1997-98 and 1998-99. The President's Office, Provost's Office and Hale Library would each contribute $50,000, according to recommendations.

A remaining $225,000 shortage would be funded out of reallocated university resources. Funding that shortage may include further reductions in journal subscriptions, use of state funds and money from empty faculty lines and GTA salaries, according to the task-force report.

Long-term funding recommendations are also included in the document. Three suggested sources of revenue are an increase in state funding, a $10 million KSU Foundation fund-raising campaign and a new $2 per-credit-hour privilege fee.

Other suggested revenue streams include requesting a portion of KSU Alumni Association dues, requesting support from the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, conducting fund drives for the periodical fund and a tuition increase.

Student Body President Tim Riemann said the report includes many suggestions that would involve student funds.

"The thing that concerns me the most is that if we get down to what some of these are really saying, a lot are going to be directly hitting the students," he said. "A $2 fee is a direct tax on students. A tuition increase is also a direct tax on students.

"We're basically taking more money from students but putting it under different guises so it doesn't look quite so bad."

Riemann said asking students to pay so much extra for library materials might go against public education principles.

"If the end result is that students have to pay more to ensure the quality of higher education, then the state of Kansas isn't doing its job to provide students with higher education," Riemann said.

The task-force proposal, however, defends the use of student fees to fund Hale improvements.

"If K-State's library is underfunded, both faculty and students suffer. If faculty do not have access to the latest knowledge in their respective fields, the quality of classroom education will decline. Students, therefore, have a major stake in improving library conditions," the report states.

The task force's recommendations were sent to several faculty members and student leaders involved in funding decisions. An open forum to discuss the proposal is also planned. The date and time have not yet been announced.

decisions about which print journals to cancel.

If the UNCOVER service costs more in article fees than the printed version, then it does not make sense to use electronic access means, Ossar said.

McCahon said the library will monitor costs for the UNCOVER service and costs for the printed version.

When usage makes the printed version cheaper, the library will subscribe. However, journals the library subscribes to cannot be ordered through UNCOVER.

Hobrock said the time it takes to stop electronic services and begin printed services could be as long as six months.

In the meantime, the library would have to continue to use and pay for the UNCOVER service to provide access for its patrons.

Ossar also said the library has to be careful to not cancel journals that are only available in print. He said this will require some awareness and faculty feedback on library management.

Finally, Ossar said the library could be caught in a cycle of increasing costs.

"As people start canceling journals, the journals are going to have to start increasing their fees they charge to UNCOVER," Ossar said.

"The problem with printing is inflation, but the same thing is going to happen to the electronic providers," he said.

If the library has to go back to a printed version, it may find the subscription price has increased as part of the inflation due to fewer print subscribers.

Another problem is paying for the new electronic services.

There is not enough funding to maintain the library's electronic agenda.

The library's yearly budget cannot keep up with inflation or pay for all the services the library plans to offer.

If the library spends more than the $200,000 in its budget for UNCOVER or does not get the additional funding it needs, other budgets would have to be cut to make up for the shortfall.

These cuts could put the library in an even worse situation than before the new system was installed, Hobrock said.

have to fall back on the interlibrary loan process, which will be slow," Hobrock said. "But that's the necessity of that outcome."

He said the interlibrary loan system is cumbersome, but would be the only means available to provide information not available in Hale. However, it is still expensive because of its infrastructure, equipment and the staff required to operate it.

Hobrock said this is a worst-case scenario, but the funding has to come from somewhere.

Hobrock said K-State's library system has always ranked near the bottom of the Big 12. It is now ranked last, Cynthia McCahon, task force chair, said.

"If we get the funding we're proposing, we'll really have a chance of having a much better library because we've always been at the bottom end of the Big 12," Hobrock said.

The University of Texas at Austin is ranked first, McCahon said, because it has built a large collection of printed materials over time with more than 7.3 million volumes on the shelves and more than 51,000 journals. K-State has 1.3 million volumes and 8,800 journals.

Also, K-State has a $7.1 million budget compared with $22.8 million at Texas.

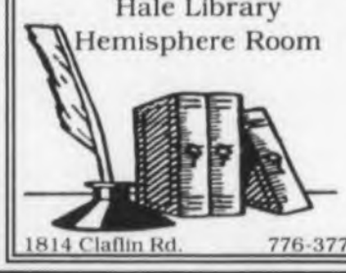
jobs and, in my case, I have a family."

MacDougall's family includes his son Rob, also a senior in social work and part of First Things First. The younger MacDougall said he'd contacted Student Body President Tim Riemann, but hadn't received any communication from him.



MacDougall Sr. pointed out the athletic department's table is staffed by paid employees, including Urick.

Choitz said the group wants to make its case to the student body before the referendum on Nov. 17 and 18, when students vote on whether to allocate money from privilege fees, paid at the beginning of each semester, to pay for the expansion.

"Our primary concern is getting all the facts before the decision," she said.

K-State students nominated for Rhodes, Marshall scholarships

HANG NGUYEN
senior staff writer

Several students were nominated to represent K-State in competition for the Rhodes and Marshall scholarships.

Wendy Reeves, senior in microbiology; Amy Schieferecke, senior in political science and international relations; and Jonathan Winkler, senior in English, physics and math are nominees for the Rhodes Scholarship.

Justin Kastner, senior in food science; Vicki Choitz, senior in political science, women's studies and education; and Winkler are nominees for the Marshall Scholarship.

K-State scholar adviser Beth Powers said both scholarships provide $40,000 to $60,000 to support two years of graduate study in England. Rhodes scholars study at Oxford University while Marshall scholars may study at any university in Great Britain.

"These students were not only nominated for their leadership skills, but also for their motivation to help society in one way or another," Powers said.

Reeves said students had to be nominated by K-State faculty for the Rhodes Scholarship. Students also needed eight to 10 letters of recommendation from faculty and a personal essay. An intensive 20-minute interview with faculty was also required.

"The interview process was difficult and quite new because it was hard to go in and get grilled for 20 minutes," Reeves said.

Reeves is also a Goldwater, KSU Presidential and June Hull Sherrid scholar, and received the KSU Basic Cancer Research Award. Reeves said if she receives the scholarship to go to Oxford, she intends to get a master's degree in biochemistry and do research on cancer cells.

Kastner, a city commissioner for two years, said he hopes to attend South Brooke University in London to study food safety and control. Kastner's various achievements include being a Truman Scholar, Golden Key National Honor Society and Blue Key National Leadership Honor Society member.

"I want to be in England in order to research such diseases as mad cow, CJD, a neurological disease and E. coli. The program in London marries the science and politics of food safety," he said.

Winkler was nominated for both the Rhodes and Marshall scholarships. He is a Goldwater Scholar, member of Phi Beta Kappa and Golden Key National Honor Society and columnist for the Collegian.

"I feel honored to be nominated for both scholarships and also obliged to do my best to represent the university in both competitions," he said.

For both scholarships, he has selected a master's program that involves investigating the physics of wear. However, he will not be able to receive both scholarships.

"As far as I know, no Marshall winner who has gone on to pursue a Rhodes Scholarship has won, since the Rhodes committees know the names of Marshall winners as soon as they are chosen and generally prefer not to waste a Rhodes on someone who already has a Marshall," Winkler said.

Nominees for both scholarships will compete in a state-level interview before advancing to the regional interviews. Marshall nominees will be interviewed in mid-November. Rhodes interviews will be in early December. K-State is preparing its representatives.

"There will be three practice interviews by faculty members to help prepare the nominees," Powers said.

Nominees said they couldn't have made it this far without their advisers' help.

"K-State and its academic and animal science advisers have done an excellent job of helping students become more competitive. I'm indebted to them," Kastner said.

Powers said she's proud of the nominees.

"I think the nominees are spectacular," she said. "They've all worked hard to get to this point. All have great potential to make a difference to the world on a big and small level. All are eminently qualified for the scholarships."

Source: Task Force to Plan for Financing the Library of the Twenty-fisrt Century
JEFF COOPER AND ANDREW MARCINIAK/Collegian

If fall 1997 will be remembered as the season Hale Library opened, it will also be seen as the time decades of funding imbalances and rising costs in journal subscriptions culminated in outcry among faculty and students for more library support.

Never before in the past decade have faculty, administration and students focused more attention on the library's funding of its basic resources. And never before could the creation of a new student privilege fee, perhaps one to fund the library's purchase of books and journals, be faced with more competing issues — a fee for stadium expansion, desired fee increases from nearly every student service on campus and tuition increases that have ballooned the cost of a K-State education in the past five years alone.

But quietly gurgling below this wintry surface of big bucks and special interests are a few individuals — students and faculty — talking about the creation of a library student fee.

Among the questions yet to be answered are how much the fee would amount to, for students and the library. Or how much support it has among students and administrators.

•Student Governing Association

Student Body President Tim Riemann said he looks to students for the answers to many of those questions. He said he would like a referendum that could be decisive, allowing Student Senate's decision on the matter to be representative of the campus.

Riemann

"Sure, a lot of universities have a library fee that supports the periodicals and monographs, but there aren't many universities that pay for the actual structure," Riemann said.

Riemann said he concedes the library needs money to keep up with rising journal costs, but at an inflation rate of 15 percent for some subscriptions, he wonders how far the money would go.

"I think it would be fairly noble for the library to come forward and ask for a fee that sunsets," Riemann said.

A sunset clause would automatically terminate a fee after a set number of years.

Riemann said he would be interested to see what students think about a possible library endowment generated from the fee.

"I think students would flinch a bit to see themselves putting money aside for something they'll never see," Riemann said. "I don't know if history would say it's appropriate."

He said he would like a fee that retires after five years based on the hope the entire library article retrieval process is drastically different. He also questions whether undergraduates want to pay for something that more directly benefits faculty and graduate students.

Although Riemann hasn't tossed any hard numbers around yet, he said a $2-per-credit-hour fee is steep.

"I think the library fee is going to be a hard sell," Riemann said.

If the fee were to become more of an issue, it would have to pass through the hands of Privilege Fee Committee Chair Aaron Otto.

Otto said a proposal would have to be made to the committee before it would begin working on the issue.

The Student Governing Association aspect is complicated by the creation of an ad-hoc committee of the Student Senate Academic Affairs Committee that specifically addresses the library.

Otto said the ad-hoc committee could conceivably choose between various fee proposals. He said the Task Force to Plan for Financing the Library of the Twenty-First Century is the entity that could make fee proposals. It remains to be solved, he said, how the fee would be implemented and what entity would budget and dispense the money in the long run. He said other issues, like matching grants and endowments with the fee money, also need addressing.

"I think students would be opposed to just having a student fee and that's it," Otto said. "It won't solve all our problems. The library is everybody's. It's not just the students who should be the sole provider for the library."

•Administration

The administration has not reached a consensus on a library fee, either. Off the record, many administrators express either support or criticism of a student fee. Those opposing the fee cite whether it is the place of undergraduate students to fund an entity that is the very heart of academic K-State.

Hobrock

Those administrators supporting the fee are cautious but optimistic that students themselves are interested in creating a fee.

Brice Hobrock, dean of the library, has discussed the creation of a $2-per-credit-hour student fee with the library task force.

"The $2 is not an accident," Hobrock said. "It's looking at the total funding plan to meet the objectives the task force has laid out. Students would provide 20 percent of the total funding needed."

Hobrock said a sunset fee was not included in the proposal.

"The ugly thing about this business of acquisitions is, it goes on. It never ends," he said. "If the legislature would do the right thing and pick up the funding, the sunset clause would be in order."

Of the possibility of an endowment, Hobrock said he would not be opposed to looking at that option. He said he could see an endowment used for matching grants with donors.

"I'm very open to innovative ways of solving this," he said.

Meanwhile, the Provost's Office has added a 1-percent increase to the university's fiscal year 1999. Other Operating Expenses budget proposals to the Legislature would strictly be used for the library. The increase would amount to nearly $320,000 more for Hale's budget.

McCahon

Cynthia McCahon, chair of the library task force, released the task force's long-range solutions report Monday, which recommends, among other things, the creation of a student fee.

McCahon said she's heard support for the fee, but doesn't see it as a cure-all to the library's needs. She said she also supports involving students in how fee money would be spent.

"If students are going to be putting a lot of money into something, students should be involved in an allocation process," she said.

McCahon said the task force has discussed the inclusion of faculty on a fee dispensing

Student fee 1 option among many for Hale

The movement to create a student fee to support the purchase of books and journals for Hale Library is in its infancy. Little is known about it, even less is known about support for it, and no one knows what it could cost.

But what could it cost? If some numbers were thrown on the table, what could a fee generate in dollars and how could it be put to use in the library?

Tom Schellhardt, associate vice president for administration and finance, tossed some numbers around in his office last week that illustrate a few scenarios students could support.

Schellhardt is a member of the Task Force to Plan for Financing the Library of the Twenty-First Century and has consulted with the task force about student-fee issues. The following three scenarios were generated out of a conversation Schellhardt had with the Collegian.

The first scenario is based on the concept of a student fee such as the $2-per-credit-hour the task force is proposing. That would generate about $710,000 per year based on the fiscal year 1998 enrollment and fee statistics. This fee money could then be given to a committee, perhaps a subcommittee of the University Library Committee of Faculty Senate, that would decide how the money was spent.

The $2 fee amounts to an additional $22 in fees per semester, which brings the total up from $251 to $273, or $546 per two-semester year. Fees are generated on a linear scale, of sorts, so a $1-per-credit-hour increase generates $355,146, or half that of a $2 fee.

Fees are calculated as a flat rate

Helicopter, spy plane shore up U.N. inspections

CAIRO, Egypt — A U-2 spy plane makes sweeps high over Iraq while helicopters below click pictures of specific sites.

Chemical sensors sample air outside factories suspected of making chemical weapons. Video cameras monitor other factories, transmitting pictures to U.N. offices in Baghdad to ensure that Iraq is not secretly making parts for long-range missiles.

The U.N. weapons program is among the most intrusive courses of action taken against a vanquished foe — and it has uncovered Iraqi efforts to build some of the most horrifying weapons ever developed.

In one case, inspectors sifting through import documents uncovered an Iraqi program to build enough biological toxins, such as anthrax and botulism, to kill millions. The documents showed that Baghdad had purchased 40 tons of growth media, far more than would have been needed for decades of routine research and hospital use.

"It's a game of cat and mouse, and the mouse doesn't cooperate with the cat," said Tim Trevan, who served on the weapons inspection team from 1992 to 1995.

The inspectors' job is to verify that Iraq has destroyed its weapons of mass destruction and accepted a monitoring system — a requirement of Security Council sanctions imposed after Iraq's 1990 invasion of Kuwait, which led to the Persian Gulf War. The inspectors say Iraq has not done so.

In the latest confrontation, Iraqi President Saddam Hussein demanded that all American weapons inspectors leave the country, accusing them of spying. But the United Nations has said it will not allow Hussein to blackball monitors from any country.

Weapon inspectors' expulsion postponed

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Iraq agreed Tuesday to postpone the expulsion of U.S. weapons inspectors until after U.N. envoys finish their mission, in an apparent bid by Baghdad to take its case to end sanctions directly to the Security Council.

After an appeal by U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, Iraqi officials said they'd wait until after the envoys' report to the Security Council, in order to create a "positive environment" for today's mission.

Iraq had vowed to expel seven U.S. inspectors working with the United Nations by today.

It was far from certain if the postponement, announced both in Iraq and at the United Nations, would solve anything. Iraq already has rejected the envoys' message, which said to rescind the expulsion order against the Americans and cooperate fully with the U.N. inspectors.

But by waiting to carry through on the expulsions, Iraq appeared to be trying to get the council to address President Saddam Hussein's agenda: a deadline from the United Nations for lifting the punishing sanctions, imposed for its 1990 invasion of Kuwait.

Annan said Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz would come to New York to argue his government's case.

The Security Council has said it will not lift the sanctions — which include an embargo in Iraq's important oil exports — until arms inspectors certify that Iraq has eliminated its weapons of mass destruction.

The crisis arose last week when Iraq announced that Americans will be barred from U.N. inspection teams on grounds they are spying and working to maintain the crippling economic sanctions.

Iraq continued that policy Tuesday, blocking for the second-straight day U.N. inspectors trying to check weapons sites inside the country. Authorities reiterated they would not grant access to teams that included

Weight gain-induced estrogen linked to breast cancer in women

CHICAGO — A study of more than 95,000 nurses provides what might be the strongest evidence yet that women who put on a lot of weight during adulthood raise their risk of breast cancer substantially.

Researchers said the reason is that body fat increases the amount of estrogen in the bloodstream. And estrogen is thought to promote breast tumors.

Women who are not taking estrogen after menopause increase their risk of breast cancer with every pound they gain after age 18. Among these women, those who put on at least 45 pounds are twice as likely to develop spreading breast cancer as women whose weight had changed less than five pounds.

The study tracked 95,256 nurses, ages 30 to 55, for 16 years, ending in 1992. During that period, 2,517 cases of spreading breast cancer were found, 1,000 in premenopausal women and 1,517 in postmenopausal women.

Communication with Pathfinder breaks down after 83rd day

PASADENA, Calif. — It might be over for Mars Pathfinder.

The spacecraft isn't communicating with its controllers, and efforts to restore contact are being cut back to only once every two weeks, Richard Cook, the Pathfinder mission manager at NASA's Jet Propulsion Laboratory, said Tuesday.

No signal from the lander has been received on Earth since Oct. 7. The last successful transmission of actual data was on Sept. 27, the 83rd day of the mission.

The spacecraft, which landed on Mars on July 4, had lasted far longer than its life expectancy of at least 30 days. But scientists had hoped for atmospheric data as the seasons changed on Mars.

Russian film director dreams of Mir movie filmed in space

MOSCOW — The year is 1999, and it's a sad day for Russia's space program. The Russians are turning out the lights on their beloved Mir space station and bringing home the last cosmonaut.

But wait. There's one last snag. A renegade cosmonaut insists on remaining aboard, declaring he will orbit the earth for the rest of his days.

Ground controllers order him home, then plead and beg, but can't persuade the maverick spaceman to abandon ship.

The last-ditch plan: Send up a woman to lure him back.

As if there hasn't been enough high drama on the Mir in recent months, Russian film director Yuri Kara is pushing to make a movie — with real actors aboard the space ship — before the Mir station is discarded in about two years.

"In the next century, directors will shoot films on the moon and maybe even on Mars," Kara said in an interview with the Associated Press. "Someone has to be the first to film in space. Why not me?"

Space officials have yet to give the final go-ahead, but the idea is getting serious consideration. The director's biggest obstacle probably will be getting financing for the project.

The movie project, aptly titled "Space Flight Has a Price," will require at least $20 million to send two actors to the Mir, and millions more to finish. A financier has yet to step forward.

At the Venice Film Festival in August, he offered the female lead to British actress Emma Thompson, who declined.

Also on his wish list is Tom Hanks, with his proven appeal as an astronaut in "Apollo 13," and John Travolta, a licensed pilot who has expressed interest in space travel.

CLIF PALMBERG/Collegian

CYNTHIA PRICE COHEN, executive director of ChildRights International Research Institute, spoke to an audience Tuesday evening in Umberger Hall regarding international child rights.

Lecturer says children have right to respect, own views

BRANDI HERTIG
staff reporter

The United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, which was adopted by the U.N. General Assembly in 1989, had 186 countries ratify the convention as of March 1996.

The United States is not among that number, despite having drafted several of its articles.

The convention contains 54 articles, 41 of which outline specific rights children should be granted, such as quality standards of living, health and health services and the right to enjoy their own culture, language and religion.

Lou Douglas lecturer Cynthia Price Cohen said four rights are especially important: the child's right to survival, non-discrimination, actions taken in the best interests of children and respect for the child's views.

"A child should be treated as a part of the whole system of life," Cohen said during the Tuesday lecture.

Cohen, executive director of ChildRights International Research Institute, cited two specific groups in the United States opposed to the ratification: conservative-religious and home-education groups.

The groups against the ratification are organized, Cohen said. They send out misinformation and distort ideas.

Article 14 of the convention grants children the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion. Cohen said many religious groups have construed this to mean children can join cults if they so desired.

That is not the case, Cohen said. The article states the parents or legal guardians are to be involved in helping the child exercise this right.

Cohen said the home-education groups are concerned with Article 29, which outlines aims of education for children.

There is nothing in the article that says children have to attend public or private school, she said.

"This (the convention) is nothing to be afraid of," she said.

Benefits of ratification are threefold, Cohen said.

First, the United States would be eligible to have a member serve on the Committee for the Rights of the Child, which means the United States would have input, she said.

Second, it would help in forming a uniform way to look at children's rights worldwide, she said.

Third, ratification would guarantee an education to children, something the United States doesn't have now, she said.

The United States signed the convention in 1995, but nothing else has been done since then, Cohen said. Senate is concerned ratification of the convention, which contains several articles that would have to be implemented at the state level, could interfere with states' rights.

Cohen urged supporters of the convention to write to state senators, asking them to reassure the federal government that Kansas will comply with the ratification.

She said New York has already promised to comply with the convention upon ratification.

"I've been told that for every 1,000 letters Senate receives against something, they only receive one for it," she said.

Women avoid competition, lecturer says

SHEYENE FOSTER AND JOHN FRANSON
staff writers

Author, activist and athlete Mariah Burton Nelson spoke Tuesday about women's relationship to competition and the reasons many women back away from it. Nelson spoke at Forum Hall to an audience of about 200, composed mostly of women athletes.

"Women in particular have ambivalence about competing," Nelson said. "We're afraid to win. We're afraid to lose. We're afraid people won't like us if we take big risks."

Nelson said women avoid competition for four reasons. One of the first and foremost is the fear of winning and seeming different from everyone else.

"The message many women are receiving is that they are supposed to be small, dainty, delicate, deferential to men," Nelson said. "Women need to know that it's fine, it's important, it's even wonderful to be outstanding, to be proud of the way you are."

Another reason Nelson said women avoid competition is fear of losing. She said many women avoid taking risks in their careers, relationships, sports and academics because of the fear of failure.

However, Nelson said losing is not necessarily negative.

"Losing is part of what happens on the way to success," Nelson said.

Nelson said both the fear of winning and failure can be destructive to women and their success.

"What happens to a lot of women, I think, is that because of the fear of failure or the fear of winning, we fail to compete," Nelson said. "If we fail to compete, we lose."

Nelson said another factor that might hold women back from competition is the way society defines competition.

She said society defines competition in a sort of conquering way — to win is to slaughter, kill, utterly defeat, something only men are supposed to do.

Women, on the other hand, are taught not to compete in the main arena, but to be the cheerleaders, Nelson said. She said women are taught to sit on the sidelines and compete for beauty and men.

Nelson said women need to stop thinking of themselves as the cheerleaders of society.

"I suggest you think of yourselves as champions," Nelson said. "Dare to speak up for yourselves and other women."

A final factor Nelson said holds women back from achieving their full potential is the internal enemy.

"The most difficult opponent you will ever have to face is yourself," Nelson said.

Nelson also said women have to forgive themselves immediately for mistakes.

"I think we have no time for self-recrimination," Nelson said. "Life just moves too fast."

Nelson said women can, however, overcome these obstacles. She encouraged men to have the courage to stand up for the women in their lives and to support their efforts.

"Women have been cheering for men for a lot of years now," Nelson said. "I think it's about time that men turn around and cheer for women."

Women must defy society's traditional roles and try to be real, Nelson said. They must try to avoid slipping into stereotypes, or accepting their second-class status and do what's right for them.

"We can't wait for the men in power to take it upon themselves to give women equal rights," Nelson said. "We have to stand up for them."

Nelson is the author of three books dealing with feminism and women in competition. These include "Are We Winning Yet?" (1991), "The Stronger Women Get, The More Women Love Football" (1995) and "Embracing Victory: Life Lessons in Competition and Compassion" (to be released in 1998).

Commission approves promotion, tourism budget

JENNI EVANS
staff reporter

The City Commission unanimously approved the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce's proposed Industrial Promotion and Tourism and Convention Contract and budget for the upcoming year on Tuesday.

Manhattan Chamber of Commerce President Dan Colantone outlined some of the benefits that small- and medium-size businesses and the community have gained from the chamber.

"The true partnership we have with the city, the university and the community is truly remarkable," Colantone said.

Colantone said the chamber wants to work on retention and expansion of local businesses this year.

Also covered in the meeting was a previously tabled resolution dealing with Social Service Advisory Board member appointments.

Commissioners listened to Jean Hill, Social Services Advisory Board corresponding secretary, discuss the uniformity in board member appointment procedures.

"We feel it is very important that when a board member has not fulfilled their full three-year term, new members be given a three-year term as well, not a partial term," Hill said.

Hill said new board members need the three-year term to learn what the board is about and have time to become effective board members.

Other board members expressed many of the same sentiments.

"There is no consistency in the decisions that are being made," board member Shirley Bramhall said.

She said new members concluding a partial term would miss pertinent discussions in regard to the allocation of funds.

The Commission decided board members who finish unexpired terms would not receive full three-year terms. The Commission said people who are appointed to partial terms are usually appointed to full terms after the partial terms anyway.

In other business, it was approved that Manhattan veterinarians assist in the registration process of cats and dogs.

The change in ordinances will coordinate rabies vaccinations with the licensing process.

As animals are brought in for their rabies shots, veterinarians will provide the registration forms for licensing.

"A very small number of pets are licensed, and we hope that by including the vets, we will get greater participation rates," Curt Wood, director of finance, said.

The advantages of this simple and effective process will be evident to pet owners, Wood said.

He also said registration will spread the customer service office's workload more evenly throughout the year.

"I'm really pleased to see you do this and to include veterinarians. Compliance could really be increased," Commissioner Karen McCulloh said.

Alternative funding sources need to be evaluated at K-State

Organizations receiving student privilege fees are taking the wrong approach to getting more money for their groups.

It seems as though a "privilege-fee-first" mentality is in vogue at K-State. Students, who have a hard enough time surviving, should not be paying more money out of their pockets when alternative sources of funding are available. Some students don't even have enough money to eat a balanced meal, much less pay for library periodicals, a stadium expansion, increasing health-care costs or equipment upgrades.

Every option should be explored before asking students to shell out more money, because better solutions exist to funding problems.

The state government has excess money in its budget. If the state truly cares about the quality of education of Kansans, why doesn't it distribute more money to the universities?

The government is providing more money for primary and secondary schools. That funding won't do any good when a high school student graduates and can't attend K-State because it costs too much.

Alumni can donate money to the university, and they shouldn't worry about getting their names on buildings. Needs exist, and alumni need to realize this.

Hale Library is a perfect example of this. The university has this great-looking building that has the fewest serial periodicals in the Big 12. What good is a new library if there's nothing in it?

Increased fund raising is another option that should be explored. This would allow alumni who can't donate as much as others to feel like they are still a part of the university.

Alumni should be concerned with helping the university that helped them get where they are.

When are privilege fees going to stop increasing? How much is too much? When is the line going to be drawn?

The cost of education is high enough already, and fees are getting outrageous.

A legacy of FRAUD

Fraudulent SGA elections not the worst of it

Last Thursday morning, across the subdued glory that is the K-State campus, squirrels hurriedly prepared for winter, fresh candy was poured into administrative dishes, and students awoke to find they no longer have legal representation in the form of student government.

After recoiling from the shock, they rolled over, pushed snooze and went back to the long sleep of apathy that has blanketed K-State students for at least a decade. True, no one really cares but those few Student Governing Association types who stay up Saturday nights reading bound legislation (a dying breed), but it's the principle of the thing.

Perhaps the local media should call for their immediate resignation, but just what exactly do frauds resign from if they were never a part of it to begin with? For objectivity's sake, and we know that's important, I myself was a senator just two short years ago. And yet, I was never technically elected; therefore, I was never technically a senator.

All across campus, do-gooders are now faced with crossing "Student Senator: challenged the administration, stood up for student rights, discussed 'Seinfeld' in the hallway during meetings" off their résumés. It is surely a pity.

Now, dear friends, what does this do, historically speaking, to the credibility of SGA? One might say it would actually improve things, but that would be a big assumption. Instead, these years of fraud have brought to light many more years of fraud. In essence, fraud in SGA goes back many, many years, even to the so-called "Kansas Decade of Fraud" in the 1870s.

●February 1873: SGA is still an underground organization legislatively backed by the administration. It is charged with fighting the soybean ranchers who have encroached on the north 40 of campus. To gain financial resources to fight the squatters, senators began selling moonshine out of the Goodnow House barn while funneling the money into a special Foundation account that still exists to this day.

●September 1917: In a wild election year, Student Body President Timmy Lenin is criminally charged with replacing the entire senate with coal workers from the Ukraine. The administration caught on only after they realized the entire senate were Russian language majors.

The missing senators (the actual students) were found living in communal housing in western Kansas. Those students stayed on and founded what is today the Gem, Kan., metropolitan area.

●May 1973: Four student senators are arrested after having broken into the Ramada Inn headquarters of the Arts and Sciences Student Council. Among the things they took: evidence of an A&S conspiracy to abduct and kill dangerous newspaper columnists and process their carcasses as cadavers in anatomy classes, plans to a secret super computer rumored to have the ability to kill Superman and a letter from Jimmy Hoffa that allegedly read: "Good work kids. The Cubans will be most happy. Most happy."

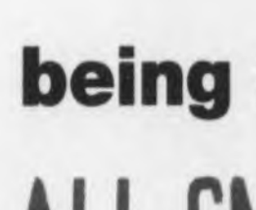
●November 1984: Senate begins hearings on whether several senators conspired with the administration in a student recruitment scheme. Apparently, the administration proposed to sell (at a loss) Farrell Library books to small Kansas towns in exchange for the release of that town's students to attend K-State.

The so-called "books-for-students" concept was ruled to be illegal and was eventually stopped a little more than two weeks ago, but not before a former SGA secretary had shredded most of the evidence.

●March 1992: Senate passed a resolution commending Gov. Joan Finney. The body was then taken to court by several students for recognizing the existence of the so-called Finney administration.

If these true accounts strike you as even remotely outrageous, remember that to find the truth you must tell lies. We are mere pawns of a larger conspiracy of student governing organizations. Is it a move toward the globalization of student education or a more sinister way to keep students busy while big business profits from university research?

No, it's worse yet. Students leaders worldwide are nefariously using the pretenses of student government for something intangible, the feeling of self-importance. By disregarding their own rules, these leaders are telling us, ever so slyly, they are above the rest of us.



Is that, in and of itself, such a crime? Well, comrade, why don't we consider this over a nice bowl of hot Union soybeans?

being a cigar girl NOT ALL SMOKE AND FLAMES

VIEWPOINT

LESLEY BAKER
LESLEY BAKER is a senior in mass communications. You can send e-mail to Lesley at lrb8205@ksu.edu.

I'm called Jesse.

I'm a cigar girl.

For the most part, I enjoy my job. What I do is ferry a tray full of cigars and cigarettes into, roughly, six various bars, Wednesday through Friday from 9:30 p.m. until about 2 a.m. I don't do this by myself. I work for a company called Humidor Dreams. The tips are good, sometimes.

I certainly get to meet a lot of interesting people. I have found out that the ladies room is usually the most violent place in a bar.

But I do have some complaints. Most of my customers are men — more specifically, male K-State students. Some of you are really wonderful customers. You're polite. You joke. That's good. The cigar girls as a whole really appreciate you.

Now, if you're not one of those people, then I'm talking to you. You seem to be rather confused on how to treat a cigar girl. I'm hoping to clean that little problem up here.

You see, it really ticks me off when I'm asked my price along with the cigars and cigarettes. It also ticks me off when I'm motioned across a crowded bar simply to embarrass your friends. I really don't like being groped or fondled — it's not my idea of fun. I also get very upset when I'm lectured on the evils of nicotine by a man holding a beer can.

What I want you guys to remember is that I'm a cigar girl, but not your cigar girl. Just because you've purchased merchandise from me does not mean that you have any rights to me personally.

I'm not for sale.

I expect you to treat me with some measure of decency. As it is, I'm about to start hitting people with my cigar case. Hopefully, this should clear up the behavior that I've been experiencing of late.

Also, this is for the women — you know who you are. When you're asked, politely, if you'd like to buy a cigar or cigarette you can, politely, refuse. You do not have to react like I just offered you a mud-encrusted tadpole. I am also a person, not the kitchen slut who forgot to use the servants' door.

I would like to say, though, on a happier note, those of you who have bought from me and have been polite about it are the only reasons I haven't quit.

Thank you.

Bicycle racks would solve K-State parking problems

Editor

I have noticed an ongoing problem here in the past three years. I don't own a car, and therefore ride my bike to and from class. The problem is there aren't enough bike racks on this campus.

Almost everyday I find myself cruising through campus just to find a safe place to park my bike. By the time I find one, I'm late for class. Now, maybe I'm a little hostile since I've already had an $800 bike stolen off this campus, but something needs to be done.

I always hear talk of more parking spaces, but what about more bike racks? Not only are they cheaper, but they also would decrease the amount of traffic on our campus and make K-State a pedestrian-friendly college.

Students should fund KSU Stadium expansion

Editor,

I encourage students to vote yes on the KSU Stadium expansion project.

The core of the argument against a stadium expansion appears to be inadequate resources at Hale Library. I would never downgrade the importance of academics and the continuing efforts to remedy that situation. That's why students attend this university.

When I was a K-State student, the push was to overhaul a dilapidated Farrell Library. Now a gleaming state-of-the-art structure stands on that site.

Our student fees were used, in part, to help fund the construction of Bramlage Coliseum and the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex facelift.

Even though I haven't visited Hale Library or the recreation complex since their expansion, to say I haven't benefited would be untrue. I'm proud to know I played a small role in their completion for the use of current students.

Stadium expansion will assist K-State in competing in the Big 12 Conference for years to come. That, in turn, might mean higher enrollment and more revenue for other worthy university projects.

Mid-term evaluations would benefit teachers

Editor,

Every semester I hear people complain about some negative aspect of their classes or teachers. However, when the time comes for teacher evaluations, many students put little effort into critiquing their teachers.

Many things cause this apathy in students, such as exams, projects and plans for celebrations at the end of the semester. Students feel apathetic because the critiquing they're doing will affect the classes of the next semester, not the current one.

If K-State required teachers to administer mid-semester evaluations, then perhaps students would participate more thoughtfully in them. Students might have a better attitude if they know they might have an influence on the teaching while they are taking the class.

Teachers would benefit as well. They will have the opportunity to make changes if they want to before the semester ends. As a future teacher, I know the advantages of getting feedback from my students, especially when I have time to do something about it.

Please urge a student or faculty senator to consider the implementation of a mid-semester evaluation. More productive and more enjoyable teaching and learning could result.

Football expansion a question of student pride

Editor,

What seems to be overlooked in the KSU Stadium expansion is that whether or not the referendum passes, it will not affect what happens in Hale Library.

These are two separate issues that just happen to be hot topics on campus at the same time. The stadium expansion does not take any money away from Hale Library. The stadium expansion is adding an addendum to our current student fees.

Students have several options to guarantee that they can sit closer to the field on game days by either becoming a member of ICAT or getting to the game early.

Over the past several years, Wagner Field has had a variety of improvements made, such as new scoreboards, a JumboTron, fences moved, improved facilities for wheelchair patrons, modified steps, new locations for television trucks, resurfacing concourse areas, new restrooms and additional entrances and exits.

KSU Stadium is now at the point where the only thing left to do is expand the seating capacity which, in turn, will improve the game-day atmosphere as well as how the whole nation views K-State.

Everyone wants K-State football to be the best in the nation, but nobody wants to pay additional costs. The students are being asked to help by paying about one-third of the total project cost because it is their stadium more than anyone else's in the state.

Just remember to vote yes on Nov. 17 and 18 to support reserving 10,000 permanent seats for students at a cost of $1 per credit hour, with a of maximum $24 per year.

What it boils down to is not the fact of money, but more a fact of showing pride in your university, increasing the number of student jobs (more people coming to town means more work), supporting the largest activity that brings together students from all classes and curricula, and increasing the visibility and prominence of K-State.

Loan misuse can be prosecuted

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Prosecutors need not prove that people charged with misusing federally guaranteed student loan money meant to defraud the government, the Supreme Court ruled Tuesday.

It's enough to show defendants knew what they were doing when loans that should have been returned to the government were not, the justices' unanimous ruling said.

The decision clears the way for an Indiana man to be prosecuted for allegedly ordering employees at a technical school not to return unused student loan money to banks that provided the loans.

Garrit Bates had argued that charges against him should be dismissed because prosecutors did not accuse him of having fraudulent intent.

"The government need not charge or prove that Bates aimed to injure or defraud anyone," Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg wrote for the court.

The law making it a felony to knowingly and willfully misuse student loan funds contains no language requiring such proof, she said. The law was revised in 1992 to create a separate crime of failing to refund guaranteed student loan money.

Starting in 1986, Bates worked for Education America, which operated vocational and technical schools in Indiana and Wisconsin. He was chief financial officer for one of the schools, Acme Institute of Technology in South Bend.

The school received federally guaranteed student loan money on behalf of some of its students. When students receiving such funds drop out, schools are required to return the money to the bank that made the loan.

Prosecutors say Acme began having financial problems during the late 1980s, and Bates was accused of telling employees not to return unused student loan money. Instead, he gave priority to paying fees and salaries to Education America and its owners, prosecutors said.

Bates was charged in September 1994 with 12 counts of knowingly misapplying guaranteed student loan money during 1990.

A federal judge in South Bend dismissed the charges. Prosecutors did not accuse him of intending to defraud the government, and fraudulent intent is an essential element of such a crime, the court said.

The 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reinstated the charges, saying prosecutors need not prove someone meant to defraud the government.

Today, the Supreme Court agreed.

The law does not criminalize innocent, but unwise, misuse of money, Ginsburg wrote.

The law "catches only the transgressor who intentionally exercises unauthorized dominion over federally insured student loan funds for his own benefit or for the benefit of a third party," she said.

Companies search for K-State employees

▸ HEALTHY JOB MARKET LEADS more prospective employers to campus.

JENNI EVANS
staff reporter

More than 250 employers have been on campus during October, all of them searching for potential employees from K-State.

This boom in the number of employers can be attributed to several factors, but the healthy job market is the most important, Tracey Fraser, director of Career and Employment Services, said.

"It has been a marathon month. There's a super-healthy job market out there, which is really advantageous to everyone who is job searching right now," she said.

Fraser also said the increase in numbers can be attributed to the coordinated efforts between CES and the colleges across campus.

CES offers a variety of services, including workshops on résumé-building and interview techniques, as well as giving students in different colleges the opportunity to improve their skills through mock interviews.

"Mock interviews give students the opportunity to do a dress rehearsal. They get a chance to interview or visit with someone who works in their field, but it also gives employers some exposure to the quality of the student here," Fraser said.

Fraser said K-State has always had a good reputation with employers.

"Employers continually praise the quality of our K-State students. The good reputation that the faculty, the students and that the university has as a whole attracts employers here," Fraser said.

Employers are seeing the difference in students who are prepared when coming into an interview.

"I find that the K-State students that interview with us are technically competent. They're very sharp," said Darcie Bailey, production specialist for Dow Chemical Co.

Karen Meenen, manager of executive recruitment for Payless Shoesource Inc., has interviewed on campus since 1990. The company has interviewed potential employees on campus since 1984.

"We've had such success with K-State students. We've been hiring them since '84, and that's because they are so trained and they present the qualities we need," Meenen said.

The companies interviewing on campus are looking to fill a variety of positions from co-ops to internships and full-time employment. The positions cover a variety of majors.

"I haven't seen where one major is dominating or has been requested more than another. There are ample opportunities out there for all majors," Fraser said.

The September Career Fair also had an effect on the number of companies participating in on-campus interviews and participation in other areas of the campus.

"They're getting more involved with the university. They're sitting on advisory boards of academic departments, and they are interested in providing scholarship support to the university," Fraser said.

Fraser said it was important for students to get involved and get started early in their job searches.

She recommends freshmen consider the activities they participate in as well as obtaining summer jobs that provide experience.

"On-campus interviews are not the only resource. Our goal is to help students understand the importance of getting experience as an underclassman and developing skills and learning how to go through the process," she said.

Rare Poe collection contains original manuscripts

ASSOCIATED PRESS

RICHMOND, Va. — Edgar Allan Poe found respect for his dark genius hard to come by in the early 19th century. Now, a collection of more than 60 examples of Poe's rarest work has been brought together in his childhood hometown. Scholars say it's the rarest of Poe's significant volumes, letters and manuscripts.

The works provide insight into the sometimes morbid, often spellbinding prose and poetry and the tragic figure whose suffering gave credence to his work.

The Edgar Allan Poe Museum's "Quoth the Raven" exhibit, which runs through Jan. 19, contains numerous first editions of Poe's work. Few copies of these books exist, and most have never been seen by Poe enthusiasts.

The books and manuscripts seem untouched by time. Most are in their original bindings, none of them yellowed or torn.

"This collection is deep and fascinating," said Stephen Loewentheil, a rare book expert and owner of the 19th Century Shop in Baltimore. "These are museum pieces by any standards ... the highest quality American literary manuscripts in private hands."

The centerpiece of the collection is one of the 12 remaining copies of "Tamerlane and Other Poems."

Poe was a struggling 18-year-old author in 1827 when a young publisher agreed to print a few copies of the book. The 40-page book includes "Tamerlane," a poem in which Poe writes of his love for a Richmond woman, and shorter poems he wrote at age 14. "Tamerlane" was published anonymously and never distributed.

"'Tamerlane' is the black tulip of American literature," Loewentheil said. "It's the rarest of the significant volumes and the most difficult to obtain."

Also on display is an extremely rare first edition copy of "The Prose Romances." Poe was searching for a publisher to print a collection of stories but failed, so he decided to serialize the stories in 1843. The book flopped after its eventual first printing, and only 14 copies exist.

The exhibit also includes a copy of Poe's "William Wilson," in a book once owned by President Franklin Delano Roosevelt, and the first published copy of "Murders in the Rue Morgue," in Graham's Magazine.

There also is a copy of a letter Poe wrote to Washington Irving, the author of "The Legend of Sleepy Hollow," asking for help in locating a publisher.

Poe set the standard for the modern detective story and was a pioneer in the horror genre.

He is best known for crafting dark tales in which characters clinging to sanity descend into murder and madness.

An orphan who was born in Boston, Poe was raised in Virginia, where he began writing at an early age. Gambling debts forced him to drop out of the University of Virginia. Troubled by family problems after his untimely departure from the school, the 18-year-old Poe moved to Boston to start writing poetry. A young printer named Calvin Thomas agreed to publish "Tamerlane."

He married his 13-year-old cousin, Virginia Clemm, and during his life, he was known to drink excessively. After his death in 1849 at the age of 40, Poe was branded a hopeless alcoholic and drug user.

But some scholars dispute that. According to Richard Lowry, an expert on 19th-century American literature at the College of William and Mary, rumors of Poe's alcohol and drug abuse were started by a publishing rival named Rufus Griswold.

Almost all of the items in the Poe show are owned by New York businesswoman and inventor Susan Jaffe Tane, who worked with Loewentheil for more than a decade to assemble the collection. She wanted the works displayed in Richmond because Poe grew up there and got his first job in Richmond with the Southern Literary Messenger.

According to Tane, Richmond was chosen as the sight of the exhibit because Poe considered himself a Virginian.

WHEN TIME IS OF THE ESSENCE

Football is not merely a game of yards. It is also a game of seconds. For K-State football, those 25 seconds between plays make the difference between success and failure.

BY SAM FELSENFELD

K-STATE HEAD FOOTBALL COACH Bill Snyder calls in an extra-point attempt after a touchdown during the K-State vs. Texas A&M game.
IVAN KOZAR Collegian

"There are certain time intervals on the clock that dictate how we might react or what we might do."
— Bill Snyder

To the average fan, a K-State football game looks like a three-hour series of five-second battles, with 25-second breaks in between.

But many times for the coaches and players, those breaks put the Wildcats up against an opponent tougher than the team they're playing.

During that brief time, it's not the Cats against the Huskers or Buffs or Hawks.

It's K-State vs. time.

Working against time can be difficult for both sides of the ball, but it is usually more difficult for the offense.

The defense usually defends against the game situation and tries to stop what the opposing offense runs at it. Getting set for a play usually takes less time for defensive units, evident as they line up on the ball before the offense.

However, the play clock is a big enemy of K-State's offense. It's a constant chess game for K-State offensive coordinator Ron Hudson — watching the opponent's substitutions, tracking its tendencies and finally calling a play before it's too late. And Hudson doesn't have the luxury of taking a five-minute break to think things over when he's on deadline.

Instead, it's a matter of seconds, each one crucial.

"There are certain time intervals on the clock that dictate how we might react or what we might do," Coach Bill Snyder said. "Whether we would change plays at the line of scrimmage after the clock has gotten to a certain point, etc. Those types of things."

Through eight games this season, K-State has run 543 plays, an average of more than 67 battles per Saturday for Hudson.

Each play situation is completely different, but the headache is the same.

Once a play is over, Hudson assesses the down and distance situations and decides which play to call.

Then he watches the opposing defense's substitutions and tries to decide if the play will work.

"You learn to recognize the fronts and the defenses and have the appropriate call ready for what we think they're gonna be in," Hudson said.

He has a little time to think about each play. He's worrying about what to call on second down before the Cats break the huddle for first down. But when it comes time to make the call, he doesn't have a lot of time to think about it from his seat up in the press box.

"The ideal situation is: As soon as they set the 25-second clock, we're able to get the play in there," he said. "We aren't always able to do that, because sometimes you've gotta say, 'It's third down and long. What did they do against us on the last third and long? What do you think? Do you think they'll do this?' It takes a little bit of time."

But the Cats hope it doesn't take too much time.

Deadline No. 1 comes with exactly 23 seconds left on the play clock. That's when Hudson wants the play signaled from the sideline to the quarterback.

To get the play called on time, Hudson has to go through his routine and get approval from Snyder.

"If the call is made from the press box, and he likes it, he'll say, 'Call it.' And the signal people will call it," Hudson said. "Otherwise, he may make a call without even referring to the press box. As soon as the play's open, he'll call a formation and call a play that he knows he wanted to run. But most of the time, it's 'What do you like on third down and five? What do you like on third down and long? What do you like on second and long?'"

From there, the offense has eight seconds to huddle, call the play, break the huddle and meet deadline No. 2. That's at 15 seconds when Hudson wants the huddle to be broken.

Once the Cats get past deadline No. 2, they have five seconds to meet the third deadline.

That's when they need to be on the ball, ready to play.

"If we get to the line of scrimmage with less than 10 seconds on the clock, then it's going to eliminate whether or not we'll utilize motion, and whether we'll utilize play changes — certain types of play changes," Snyder said. "There's some we can still change. But not all of them."

Once the players get to the line, the coaches watch the

WILDCAT REPORT

A weekly collection of reports on the K-State sporting world

BISHOP SPEAKS

After being a silent leader since the Missouri game Oct. 11, junior quarterback Michael Bishop reappeared before reporters Tuesday. Although Bishop was taken from a postgame TV interview after the Missouri game, he said there was no specific reason he hadn't talked to the media.

"It was just something Coach (Bill Snyder) and I decided on," Bishop said. "I just adjusted to it and concentrated on football."

Since his ankle injury in the Texas A&M game, Bishop said his performance has been limited. "I haven't been trying to press as hard as I used to," Bishop said. "The ankle's OK. I just have to be careful."

CATS ON TV

Saturday's football game between K-State and Kansas will be televised across much of the state, including the entire Kansas City-area market, but will not be available in the Manhattan area.

The game is on pay-per-view because ABC and Fox Sports chose other Big 12 games that day. Kickoff will remain at the scheduled time of 1:10 p.m.

"Under the Big 12 Conference Telecast Rights Agreement, it is not permissible for a conference institution to produce an over-the-air telecast and distribute it to local affiliates within our market like we were able to do in the Big 8," said Max Urick, director of the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

"Thus, our only avenue for televising the game is on a pay-per-view basis. With the game sold out at KSU Stadium, we feel it's important to the constituency of both schools to be able to see this game. We're excited to be working with the University of Kansas and Metro Sports to provide this service to college football fans across the state."

"This game should be on television every year, and we're happy to be a part of it," Neil Harwell, general manager of Metro Sports, said. "Pay-per-view is the only way to show this game, and we're very excited to be there to do it."

TCI general manager Richard Cofer said previous contractual arrangements must be honored, so the game will not be offered in Manhattan. An ESPN game is scheduled to be on its pay-per-view channel at the time the K-State game is played.

Cofer said K-State officials asked the local affiliate to offer the game but didn't give them much notice.

Viewers can purchase the pay-per-view telecast by contacting their local cable operators. Some smaller cable systems across the state might not have the necessary equipment to provide the service.

Most large market cable operators are signed up to distribute the telecast, including American Cablevision and Jones Cable of Kansas City, TCI of Overland Park, Kan., Multimedia Cablevision in Wichita, Sunflower Cablevision in Lawrence and TCI in Topeka.

The game will be produced by Metro Sports, the 24-hour all-sports channel out of Kansas City, and distributed by cable operators throughout the state at a suggested retail price of $14.95.

Also, the Nov. 15 home finale vs. Colorado has been chosen by ABC to be televised on a regional basis. Because of this, kickoff has been changed from 1:10 p.m. to 2:30 p.m.

VOLLEYBALL TEAM ON THE TUBE

Tonight's volleyball match between K-State and Kansas will be televised by Metro Sports in Kansas City. The match will start at 7 p.m. as scheduled, and former K-State sports information director Ben Boyle will handle play-by-play duties.

RAMAGE INJURED

K-State forward Nicky Ramage sprained her right ankle Thursday morning in practice. The sophomore averaged 3.4 points and 2.7 rebounds per game last season in 11 starts. She could be back on the court when the women's basketball team starts its exhibition season Nov. 13 against the Victoria All-Stars.

GOLF TEAM IN ACTION

The K-State women's golf team is tied for 12th place after two rounds of the Diet Coke-Roadrunner Invitational in Las Cruces, N.M. The Wildcats have a total of 635, 42 shots behind first-place New Mexico State.

The Cats were in 14th place after the first day of the tournament but moved up two places, led by Jane Yi, who is tied for 18th individually with a two-round score of 152.

Other Cats in the tournament are Edie Murdoch, who is tied for 43rd, with 157; Carrie Chambers (T-53) with 159; Mitzi Taylor (T-78) with 168; and Ann Slater (T-86) with 170.

This is the final tournament of the fall season for the Cats.

NEW BOOK TO FEATURE CATS

David Smale, author of "The Ahearn Tradition" and "The Story: Kansas State Football — The Greatest Turnaround in College Football History," will produce a book on the top-40 athletes in K-State history. The book is scheduled for release in May.

The book will be a series of features on the top-40 athletes in school history. The first criterion to be featured will be athletes inducted into the K-State athletic Hall of Fame.

The list will include all sports at K-State.

"I am extremely excited to be involved in another project with Kansas State," Smale said.

"I bleed purple, and I have enjoyed the past opportunities to visit with K-Staters around the country. I am looking forward to that chance again."

Vitale injects life, enthusiasm into struggling basketball team

It's been six days since Dick Vitale visited Manhattan, and Tom Asbury's squad is still feeling the results.

In four hours, Vitale put life back into a basketball program that many critics counted out.

He arrived at Manhattan Municipal Airport by private jet and was swept to the Holiday Inn by limousine. He spoke to the men's basketball team and told its members they were better than their 10-17 record reflected a year ago. Then he gave the Tin Man a heart, the Scarecrow a brain and the Lion some courage.

Vitale's message was deep, buried under numerous personal stories that twisted and turned, made listeners laugh and made them cry, made them angry and made them proud. But in the end, Dickie V.'s message was blunt and made all eight crystal chandeliers tremble and shook life into K-State basketball.

"May all your dreams be realized," Vitale said.

His voice at times was unrecognizable to those who usually see him on ESPN or ABC. No. This was a different Dickie V., baby. Forget the paycheck Mike O'Brien, K-State's associate athletic director of development, handed Vitale when it was all over. To hear Vitale speak at the $50-a-plate dinner at the Holiday Inn on Thursday was to hear Pearl Jam play in your garage.

This was not the Vitale you get when you turn on the television. This was the kind of Dickie V. you get when you thirst for information on how to live your life.

Dickie V. doesn't drink. Dickie V. doesn't smoke. Dickie V. has not eaten red meat for years and grades the quality of a restaurant on the kind of bread it serves. Dickie V. speaks to Fortune 500 companies. Dickie V. grants interviews to sixth graders for their elementary school newspaper.

For 30 minutes, Dickie V. sat at a table and signed 250 items for fans, including 144 miniature basketballs and 110 copies of his newest book, "Holding Court." And there they were, fans dressed in suits and fans dressed in Levis, pumping Vitale's hand after he finished personalizing their books.

And then, President Jon Wefald approached Vitale the way a 10-year-old approaches Michael Jordan after a game. Vitale nicknamed K-State's president "Doc" and signed a book for him as well.

Vitale sat at the head table with Asbury, Wefald and former Wildcat basketball coaching great Jack Hartman, and they talked and Dickie V. ate fettuccine alfredo and dinner rolls and proceeded to give the best speech any basketball fan had ever heard.

You wonder how Vitale does it. You wonder how someone can stand at a podium and deliver a speech perfectly without any note cards or any effort at all.

There was Steve Carroll, one of Vitale's best friends and associates sitting in the back of the ball room. After accompanying Dickie V. to more than 250 engagements in the past three years, he knows the speeches inside and out.

Carroll looked surprised when the 250 people in attendance didn't give Dickie V. a standing ovation when he approached the microphone.

"They'll be standing when he leaves," he said.

And there is Dick Vitale, an ordinary second-generation Italian, who buried his father, John, a week ago to the day he visited K-State. There is Dickie V., who lost his best friend, Jimmy Valvano, to cancer in 1994, shouting with tears welling up in his eyes and sharing his last conversation with Jimmy.

Death and basketball have no correlation in the eyes of Dick Vitale, yet he devotes 20 hours a day to promoting the game he loves more passionately than anyone could.

There's Dickie V. telling all the Wildcat basketball players to stand. There he is emphasizing the obligation to be not only a great athlete, but also a great person. There he is, talking about David Robinson and Grant Hill and Michael Jordan and Magic Johnson, and you can't help but look at Paco May standing up and hope he scores 50 points against Kansas.

And then, there is Dickie V. telling the basketball players about having a sense of pride when they wear their purple uniforms. He nicknamed Aaron Swartzendruber "Aaron S." He told the team members if they can play Kansas to the last second, they can hang with any team in the country.

Vitale finished his speech. He wiped beads of sweat off his forehead. He got his standing ovation and left just as soon as he came.

He was off to South Bend, Ind. His appointment book for the next three days was blank. He never misses a weekend with his family.

Volleyball team ready for Sunflower Showdown of its own, hopes to continue its winning ways

DAN MERKER
assistant sports editor

It's Kansas week.

And not just for the football team. It's Kansas week for the volleyball team as well. That's all the inspiration any Wildcat needs. When playing the archrival, anything can happen. The Jayhawks roll into Ahearn Field House tonight to battle the red-hot Cats.

K-State has won eight of its past nine matches, including wins at Texas Tech and Baylor on Friday and Saturday. After going 1-3 to start the conference season, the Cats are now 8-4 in Big 12 play and just one game out of second place in the conference standings. K-State is ranked 29th in the nation by Division I-A volleyball coaches.

The Jayhawks come into town with a 1-11 conference record and an 8-17 overall mark.

KU took the same road trip as the Cats last weekend and fell 3-1 to Baylor and 3-0 to Texas Tech. The Hawks' only conference win was a 3-2 decision over Iowa State, a team that has yet to win in Big 12 action. The Cats beat KU 3-0 in their first match of the season Oct. 1 in Lawrence.

K-State head coach Jim McLaughlin expects more of a battle tonight.

"I expect them to be a lot better this time around than they were the first time we played them," he said. "They've got some talent. I know we're going to have to be steady and sideout well against them."

The schools enter tonight's match evenly, with 37 all-time wins apiece in the series. The Cats have won five consecutive matches against KU. A sixth would tip the scales the Cats' way in the all-time series.

"Considering we have such a big rivalry, we know they'll play good against us," middle blocker Kelle Branting said.

McLaughlin said the rivalry between the two schools shouldn't affect the match that much.

"It's maybe a little bit more emotion," he said. "When it comes down to it, emotion might win a game or two, but it's not going to win a match. We have to execute our game plan and be steady, play a smart match. If we do that, we'll be all right. You just have to play and do the things you do in practice."

On Friday, Oklahoma takes on the Cats at Ahearn. After that, they go on the road for matches against the four nationally ranked teams in the Big 12: Nebraska, Colorado, Texas and Texas A&M. The only one of those five teams the Cats have beaten this year is Texas A&M.

"We feel like we've been improving a lot lately, and this will be a really good way to measure ourselves and how far we have come," Branting said. "We still have quite a way left to go, but we have improved so much since the beginning of the season. It's an important stretch for us."

McLaughlin doesn't expect to look past the Jayhawks.

"KU's going to cause some problems that other teams didn't cause, but we just have to be ready and prepare like we have in the past," he said. "We're going to take care of KU first, and then right after that, that night, we're going to start worrying about Oklahoma. Both matches are important."

The match begins at 7 p.m., and admission is free with a student ID. The game will be broadcast on KSDB-FM 91.9 and will feature a talk with McLaughlin at 6:45 p.m.

FORMER K-STATE PRESIDENT RETURNS FOR CELEBRATION

Alpha Zeta kicks off Distinguished Lecture Series in Agriculture

> Education is the foundation of human progress. We must always be prepared at all times.

ZACH VADER
staff reporter

The agriculture fraternity of Alpha Zeta began its 100th anniversary celebration Tuesday afternoon with the inaugural Alpha Zeta Distinguished Lecture Series in Agriculture.

The organization started off the tradition with former K-State President Duane Acker as the guest speaker.

"I am very pleased to be back at K-State," Acker said. "It is very nice to see all of the new faces in the ag department."

The Iowa State graduate served as K-State's president for 11 years.

David Mugler, associate dean of agriculture, introduced Acker to Alpha Zeta members, faculty, staff and students.

"You've been a teacher and a mentor for many of us," Mugler said to Acker. "We appreciate you coming back for our centennial celebration of Alpha Zeta."

Acker served in both the Reagan and Bush administrations as the head of many food and agriculture programs for the United States Agency for International Development, USDA's International Cooperation and Development Office and Foreign Agricultural. Acker also served as assistant secretary for science and education.

Acker also taught animal science at Iowa State and Oklahoma State and led agricultural programs at South Dakota State University and the University of Nebraska.

Acker said there are 10 realities of agriculture and rural communities, the most important being the globalization of food and agriculture, and maintaining the availability of the food supply.

"We must use the land we have very intensely," he said. "If we waste our good land, we will have a lot of problems."

Acker also had many of solutions to these realities.

"We must recognize reality as personal and mental health," he said. "We must look at ourselves before doing anything."

Acker also said being a leader is important to being a success. He pointed out there are many things that form a leadership role — in the profession, in community, education, family and individuals.

"Education is the foundation of human progress," he said. "We must be prepared at all times."

Acker said he likes to see enthusiasm from students and that it is the most valuable trait a student should possess.

When speaking of K-State, Acker said he had one regret.

"I didn't express the appreciation that I had for the people of the university during my presidency," he said.

Being invited back for the Alpha Zeta celebration was one of the highest honors he has ever been given, Acker said.

Derek Stanley, junior in agriculture business, said he enjoyed Acker's visit.

"Having such a successful person such as Dr. Acker come back to visit is an honor," Stanley said. "I learned a lot, and it was a privilege to hear him speak."

Conviction contested in au pair case

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. — With protesters outside the courthouse holding signs such as "IQ Tests for Jurors," Louise Woodward's lawyers asked a judge Tuesday to throw out or reduce the English au pair's murder conviction in the death of an 8-month-old baby.

Millions watched on television — among them, Woodward from her prison cell — as the defense focused on getting the verdict down to manslaughter, an option her lawyers rejected just before the case went to the jury.

Defense attorney Harvey Silverglate said the all-or-nothing decision to limit the jury to first- and second-degree murder now "can be seen as a mistake."

But prosecutors said Woodward and her lawyers were just shopping around for a better deal and should not be allowed a reduced charge unless she admits what she did.

"The defense theory, if it worked, would have been brilliant. It did not work," said prosecutor Martha Coakley. "You cannot come back in and say, 'The devil made me do it.'"

A jury found Woodward, 19, guilty of second-degree murder Thursday, determining she fatally shook and slammed Matthew Eappen on Feb. 4, the day she called 911 to say the child was having trouble breathing. He died five days later. Woodward, a woman from the English village of Elton, denied hurting the boy.

Now at the center of the case that has grown from the subject of local fascination to an international cause celebre is Superior Court Judge Hiller Zobel, who said he could rule as early as Wednesday, possibly issuing his decision on the Internet through media and legal World Wide Web sites.

The judge can declare Woodward innocent, overturn the verdict and order a new trial, reduce the conviction, or uphold the verdict.

Second-degree murder, defined as intentionally killing another person with malice, carries a mandatory sentence of life in prison with the possibility of parole after 15 years.

Manslaughter, defined as causing a death by a reckless action that showed disregard for human life, is punishable by up to 20 years, but there is no minimum sentence; Woodward could be released from prison immediately.

Defense attorney Barry Scheck, gesturing forcefully with the same aggressive style he brought to the O.J. Simpson case, told the judge the case hinged on complicated scientific evidence — a hint at an article Zobel once wrote in which he said jurors often are asked to consider matters too complex for them.

Scheck complained the prosecution had not disclosed one set of autopsy photographs of the boy's skull until the end of the trial. He said the photographs showed healing of his skull fracture, indicating the injury occurred before Feb. 4.

But the judge interrupted him, saying it was the defense's decision about what points to make or not to make.

Coakley scoffed at the suggestion the photograph would have changed the verdict, saying X-rays entered into evidence were far more convincing than any photograph. The state "didn't claim that Martians killed this baby. It was clear what the evidence was," Coakley said.

Woodward's defense is being paid for by EF Au Pair, the Cambridge agency that arranged for her to come to the United States. Legal experts said the verdict, if allowed to stand, leaves the agency especially vulnerable to lawsuits by the baby's parents, Deborah and Sunil Eappen.

Kansas Board of Education seeks nearly $104 million more per year

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Beefing up aid to local school districts by $75 per student — at a cost to the state of nearly $43 million a year — is included in a proposed 1998-99 budget reviewed Tuesday by the state Board of Education.

Total increase in funding for kindergarten through 12th grade, community colleges and vocational-technical schools would be $103.8 million under the board's budget proposals. They could be altered by Gov. Bill Graves before going to the 1998 Legislature.

Among larger amounts, the board wants these increases:

- $42.8 million to raise from $3,670 to $3,745 the amount of per-student aid to the 304 local school districts to education elementary and high school students.
- $26.6 million to bring state funding for the excess cost of special education programs to 90 percent.
- $13.5 million for new technology equipment and direct Internet access for all schools.
- $9 million to fund at-risk programs for preschool 4-year-old children.
- $4.7 million to increase state credit hour aid to Kansas' 19 local community colleges by 4 percent and double funding for vocational credit hours.

Dale Dennis, assistant state education commissioner whose speciality is school finance, told the board he estimates the state has about $186 million more money to spend than estimated last April before the 1997 Legislature adjourned.

He said education will have to compete with tax relief proposals and other programs for that money but he believes schools will get some of it.

Microsoft Corp. investments questioned in Senate hearing

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Fears that Microsoft Corp.'s diverse investments in Internet businesses could dominate the emerging industry underscored a Senate Judiciary hearing Tuesday on competition in cyberspace.

"I have not made any secret of the fact that I have serious concerns about Microsoft's recent efforts to exercise its monopoly power, and that I plan to continue to examine the company's practices," said Senate Judiciary Chairman Orrin Hatch, R-Utah.

Although the loosely focused hearing wasn't technically about Microsoft, Hatch's comments set the tone for a broader debate about the company's market power. Microsoft's Windows operating software runs 80 percent of personal computers.

Hatch's state is home to Provo, Utah-based Novell Inc., which employs nearly 6,000 people and competes with Microsoft. Hatch said he might have hearings specifically on Microsoft in the future.

Microsoft offered to testify at the hearing but wasn't allowed to appear, said company spokesman Mark Murray.

In a lawsuit filed last month, the Justice Department charged Microsoft with violating a 1995 consent decree barring the company from anti-competitive practices. The suit, which seeks fines of $1 million a day, accused Microsoft of threatening PC makers with terminating their licenses for Windows if they altered Microsoft's Internet Explorer software.

Microsoft has long been accused of trying to use its dominance in the operating systems software to expand into new markets, such as online services. The company denies it was hurting competition and was merely enforcing W ndows licensing agreements.

One of the eight witnesses — Charles Rule, former Justice Department antitrust chief in the Reagan administration — cast doubts about the government's case against Microsoft.

"Basically there is no allegation that Microsoft, in effect, has disabled any competitor," said Rule, whose firm, Covington & Burling, represents Microsoft in some non-antitrust matters. "Whatever one wants to say, the government has a very tough case."

He said current antitrust laws are adequate to protect small businesses in the digital age and warned about government interference in the fast-growing technology market.

"I think we make a big mistake when we let lawyers and Congress, as bright as capable as you all are, basically decide what technology is going to get integrated into a computer," Rule said.

Other antitrust experts were more critical. One pointed to Microsoft's plan to become a gateway to other sites as a way to garner advertising revenues.

For example, Microsoft's Internet browser software has a channel bar that points users to numerous sites owned by Microsoft, such as the MSNBC news service site, and Sidewalk, a local arts and entertainment guide to cities such as Seattle and New York.

In addition, Microsoft recently purchased WebTV, which enables people to enter the Internet from their home televisions.

"It is critical that antitrust enforcers do not miss the forest for the trees," said Kevin Arquit, a senior Federal Trade Commission lawyer in the Bush administration.

Murray denied the suggestion that Microsoft's Internet browser directs people first to sites owned by Microsoft.

"It points to a variety of non-Microsoft sites as well," Murray said. He added that Netscape Communications Corp. has a similar "channel bar" but isn't as flexible as the Microsoft version.

"The more Congress learns about the Internet, the more they will understand there is enormous competition," Murray said.

Meat processing plants struggle to slaughter cattle killed in blizzard before they begin to decompose

ASSOCIATED PRESS

GARDEN CITY, Kan. — Mounds of dead cattle are serving as a nasty reminder of the blizzard that struck western Kansas last month, taking an untallied toll on ranchers and feedlot operators.

Now, the burden of the storm's aftermath is being felt at processing plants struggling to keep up with the unexpected workload.

"We've got about 12,000 head piled up out here," said Mike Hooper, plant superintendent at National Byproducts in Garden City. "We're working two 12-hour shifts seven days a week, but it will probably be the end of next week before we get through this pile."

Ranchers, dairies and feedlots reported thousands of cattle were killed in the storm that swept western Kansas on Oct. 25 and 26.

A more official estimate is expected when the November Cattle on Feed Report is issued Nov. 14, said T.J. Byram, a statistician with Kansas Agricultural Statistics.

"All lots with 1,000 head or larger capacity are included," Byram said. "One of the questions we asked is the number of cattle lost during the previous month. We will not get anything on the range cattle, however."

National Byproducts is among several plants in the Midwest that are processing and rendering the storm's victims. Workers are skinning each animal for its hide and turning the rest of the carcass into greyhound dog food.

Cold weather caused the problem, but it's the prospect of warm weather that worries Hooper and his co-workers now. The cattle could begin decomposing if the temperature rises too rapidly; highs in the mid-60s are forecast for later in the week.

"We're working as fast as we can to process them," Hooper said.

The plant was receiving up to 40 semi-truck loads of dead cattle last week, but the number has slowed in recent days.

Still, the cattle pile is too much for the Garden City plant to handle, Hooper said, so front-end loaders are scooping up many of the carcasses and dumping them into semis bound for Wichita, Omaha, Denver and Clinton, Iowa.

At those plants, the animals are skinned — hides fetch between $15 and $25 apiece, depending on their condition — and then ground up and cooked continuously, to yield protein meal and tallow.

Both products are used as animal feed supplements for dogs, chickens, turkeys and pigs.

"In a normal week, we might skin and process maybe 1,500 head," Hooper said. "But with 12,000 animals on the ground we're just skinning them and grinding them."

Most of the feedlot cattle killed by the powerful blizzard were insured, said Ron Taylor, an insurance agent with Taylor Agency, in Syracuse, Kan.

"Just like your car, they have a deductible that will depend on the size of the feed yard," Taylor said. "I'd say 99.9 percent of your commercial feed yards will carry blizzard insurance. Smaller farmers might not, or they might carry a lot higher deductible if they do."

formations set up and hope the Cats meet the ultimate deadline, when the play clock expires.

Execution during the actual play is usually best when the offense gets the play at 23 seconds, breaks huddle at 15 seconds and makes it to the line on time.

But breakdowns against the play clock happen, and there are numerous causes.

"It could be a variety of different things," Snyder said. "It could be slow getting the play called from the sidelines, or substitution concerns or problems, or if we dally too long in the huddle.

"It's all those things."

Finally, though, after all the steps are taken, the ball is snapped, a five-second battle unfolds. And then it's time for another 66 battles against the play clock.

It's entertaining for the fans, but not for Hudson.

"Games are no fun," he said. "Games are very, very exhausting. I can't wait for those three hours to get over and done with."

Smoking dreams

'Cigar girls' light Aggieville afire during weekends

JAMI NELSON
staff reporter

It was born from bar talk, the movie "Cocktail" inspired its name and it was popular in the 1920s.

Such details gave rise to Humidor Dreams, a business through which "cigar girls" sell tobacco products like cigars, cigarettes and cloves at several Aggieville businesses.

The idea for the business originated when owner Heath Polkinghorn was working at a bar.

"A guy had just been to a club in Kansas City. He'd noticed the popularity of cigar smoking coming back," Polkinghorn said.

Polkinghorn and a friend developed the concept for Humidor Dreams from a combination of the 1920s tradition and the growing popularity of cigars.

"The cigar-smoking industry has boomed in the last four or five years, and it just keeps growing," Polkinghorn said.

He got the business name from the movie "Cocktail." In the movie, there is a bar called Cocktails and Dreams. As a spin-off from that, he incorporated this movie reference and the concept of a humidor, a humidified container for storing cigars.

Now Humidor Dreams has expanded to serve several Aggieville businesses that have verbal or written agreements to allow Humidor Dreams to sell products in their establishments.

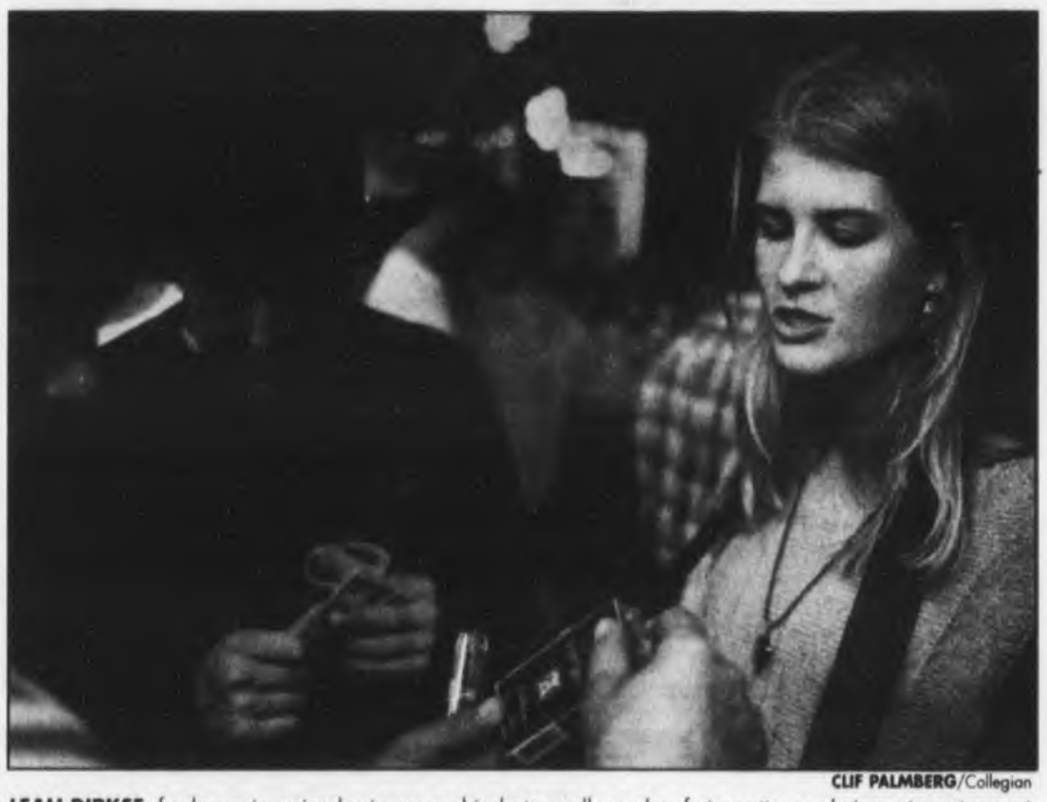
Three Humidor Dreams cigar girls do the selling.

"They just cruise around Aggieville. They cruise into the bars, sell cigars and cigarettes and have a good time," Polkinghorn said.

The bar managers do not object to Humidor Dreams' employees coming into their establishments, but their customers have mixed opinions.

"They come in mostly on our busy nights on the weekends. We allow them to sell cigars and cigarettes," Mike Robinson, manager of 12th Street Pub, said. "As far as customers go, many people don't like all the smoke, but there's a lot of people that buy them, too."

Matt Church, manager of Longhorn's, said he did not think the cigar-selling business helped or hurt Longhorn's either way. He said it is more convenient for those customers wanting to buy cigars or cigarettes because they do not have to leave the bar.



The cigar girls work from 10 p.m. to 2 a.m. Wednesday to Saturday. Usually, only one or two of them work the four-hour shift each night. Their pay is comparable to waitress wages plus tips.

"Tips average anywhere from $30, $40, $50 in a four-hour period," Polkinghorn said.

Humidor Dreams only employs women. Polkinghorn said he doesn't plan to hire any men. He said the women do an effective job of selling cigars.

"The thought crossed my mind a couple times. It's kind of like a waitress job, though," he said. "I'm selling the image as well as cigars."

The three cigar girls are K-State students. Two of them responded to the advertisement on the Career and Employment Services part-time job board in the K-State Student Union. The other answered a classified advertisement in The Manhattan Mercury.

CLIF PALMBERG/Collegian

LEAH DIRKSE, freshman in animal science and industry, sells packs of cigarettes and cigars to patrons at Longhorn's on Saturday night. Humidor Dreams employees' make the rounds of Aggieville bars from 10 p.m. to 2 a.m.

Cigar girl Amy Hutton, freshman in arts and sciences, likes the flexible hours of her job with Humidor Dreams.

"It's only on weekends and nights. It gives me time to do my school work," Hutton said.

Besides the convenient hours, cigar girl Leah Dirkse, freshman in animal science and industry, expressed another benefit of her job.

"I love meeting all the people. They do so many funny things," Dirkse said.

These funny things have led to memorable anecdotes for the cigar girls.

"I sometimes wear go-go boots, and once this guy gave me $10 so he could lick my boot," Hutton said. "That was better than most tips."

"Once, this father was hitting on me with his four sons that were 20, 22," said Lesley Baker, senior in mass communications.

But not all of their experiences are good ones. Sometimes, the cigar girls encounter sensitive situations.

"A lot of people are rude when we tell them the prices," Hutton said. "A lot of wives and girlfriends get mad at us, and we rarely make tips from girls."

Baker said she thinks she has found a solution to this jealousy by offering lollipops when she sells a cigar.

"If you have something for the women, too, they don't treat you as badly," she said.

Although they encounter many jealous glares, they also meet people who appreciate the cigar-selling service.

"I get quite a few tips from people that appreciate what we're doing," Hutton said. "Lots of free drinks, too."

Besides a few bouts of disrespect, another trial facing Humidor Dreams is inclement weather.

"The only time it really gets difficult is winter because it hurts the cigars," Polkinghorn said. He said cigars must be kept at a regulated temperature where they are not exposed to moisture.

Hutton said she dislikes working in the cold weather because of the hassle of carrying a coat into every bar.

After celebrating Humidor Dreams' one-year anniversary in October, Polkinghorn already has plans.

"At the beginning of the year, I hope to open a smoke-shop and possibly even a cigar bar," he said.

He said he believes such businesses would add more class to Aggieville.

"I think this town needs something for my age, the 20-somethings," Polkinghorn said. "Nice conversation, artwork on the walls, that sort of thing."

Auction raises money for art scholarships

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Art Review

Although the mood of the evening was economy, the Department of Art scholarship fund benefited with nearly $16,000 in receipts from the sale of 110 works at its art auction on Saturday night.

Nearly 200 local collectors and curiosity seekers turned out for the art department's art auction at Wamego's elegant Columbian Theatre.

The auction had all the makings of an art event: several represented artists were present, black attire was de rigeur and the bidding was occasionally spirited. The auction did take some time to rev up to full speed.

It began with a short tribute to Pat Hagan, the retired art department faculty member who began the auctions in the 1970s and organized them until her retirement in the 1980s. She was given a commemorative plaque for her efforts.

Hagan, after thanking the audience, 'astidiously announced, "Let the bidding begin, get your checkbooks out, and let's have fun."

The bidding began timidly. The organizers arranged the auction so many of the prime bidding pieces — those by popular local and national artists — came toward the end of the evening. Therefore, it was an hour before the auction produced some eyebrow-raising results.

At 8:30 p.m., with the auction scheduled to end at 9, a teapot by Yoshiro Ikeda selling for $490 was the first to approach $500. The majority of works, most by Kansas artists, were selling for the $100 to $200 range. By 9:30, a fair amount of collectors left the auction and at least 20 works remained.

Love songs make album smoke; band weaves sounds together

PHIL KELLUM
staff writer

Music Review

It's difficult to write a good love song.

Chicago's Smoking Popes, however, have crafted an entire album of nothing but love songs.

They make it seem easy. Maybe it's because three of the members are brothers. I don't know.

"Destination Failure" is the band's long-awaited follow-up to 1994's "Born To Quit" album, which was also an incredibly good album.

The advance cassette copy of "Destination Failure" was all but glued into my car stereo for at least three weeks solid.

It kicks off with "Star Struck One," a slow, acoustic-based tune featuring guitarist and vocalist Josh Caterer's wonderful, smooth vocals.

It blends into "No More Smiles," which is one of my favorite songs on the album.

Imagine Morrissey fronting the Ramones and that's pretty close to what it sounds like. Mike Felumlee's drum fills are great. They don't just plod along with the beat, but rather accent the beat and stand out on their own.

"I Know You Love Me" is a perfect example of the kind of love song the Popes are famous for. I especially like the staccato breakdown.

I'm a sucker for completely sappy love songs, and "You Spoke To Me" is just that kind of song.

With its very catchy guitar riffs and Caterer crooning lines like "I don't know if you actually saved my life, but you changed it that's for sure," you can't help but love it.

There's a couple of songs that seem to fit together, "Paul" and "Megan."

"Paul" starts off slow with just Caterer and a simple guitar part backing him. Then, the drums kick in, and the whole band drops in and kicks on the distortion.

"Megan" is a more bass-driven track that's got a bit more aggression to it.

I really like "Can't Find It" with its '60s pop feel with a bit of a punk edge to it. Bassist Matt Caterer's bass lines just walk all over the place, but don't seem to get lost in the fray.

The Popes return to their Ramones-ish sound with "Capital Cristine," a short, fast ditty that runs right at two minutes. Guitarist Eli Caterer's guitar solo is a nice solo. It's not too flashy, and it fits in well.

The line "I mean what I say when I say that I love you," will stick in your head for hours.

"Let's Hear It For Love" is one of my all-time favorite punk love songs. It's incredible. It's a song that will drag of $64 for the first credit hour. For more than one hour, fees increase $17 an hour, capped at 12 hours. So in this case, a fee increase only affects the second through 12th hours.

The second scenario is based on the same $2-per-credit-hour fee, but instead of turning all the fee money over to the library for spending, it would provide for a percentage for spending each year. The remaining would be funneled to an endowment account that could accrue further money.

For example, out of the $710,000 generated, $500,000 could be spent each year on library resources while the remaining $210,000 could be placed in the endowment. If the fee included a sunset clause for 10 years, at the end of the fee's lifetime more than $2,000,000 would be in the endowment that could generate a conservative 5 percent a year, or $100,000.

> What I like about the idea is that the students of today are looking to fund the library needs of the students of the future.
> • Tom Schellhardt
> vice president of administration and finance

Schellhardt said the fee and endowment plan could work, but it would benefit the library more in the long run than in the short.

"Each year, you're building up that principal," Schellhardt said. "Over time, maybe students won't have to pay a fee, but that depends on what happens with library funding. Inflation has been so high in the library it's going to take a large endowment."

The third scenario is based again on the $2 per hour plan but would place all the money into an endowment. Again with a sunset clause, at the end of 10 years the library would have an endowment for well more than $7,000,000 that could, conservatively, generate $350,000 a year.

"What I like about the idea is that the students of today are looking to fund the library needs of the students of the future," Schellhardt said.

committee. However, she said the task force is only charged with making recommendations and won't stay around to see implementation, unless its mission is changed. The Monday report did not address such specifics as how to disperse the fee, collect it, how much to charge or endowment possibilities.

"We could put a sunset with it if that's what the students prefer, but we have not gone into that amount of detail," McCahon said.

McCahon said she doesn't feel uncomfortable coming to students for money. She said she sees the library underfunding as the consequences of poor support from the Legislature that is unlikely to change.

"If we had had more money from the Legislature, we wouldn't have been in as dire a predicament as we are now," she said.

Americans.

Iraq also has warned that a U.S. surveillance flight scheduled for today risked triggering Iraqi anti-aircraft batteries, reportedly on alert in case of an American attack.

That brought a sharp response Tuesday from President Clinton, who warned that Hussein would be making "a big mistake" if his troops fired on the spy planes.

Defense Secretary William Cohen said the flights would go forward and threatened "serious consequences" if Iraq attacked.

Neither leader specified what the United States would do in the event of an Iraqi assault, but the government has already said it would not rule out a military response to Iraq's decision to bar American inspectors.

Annan sought to end the caustic rhetoric that has characterized the dispute.

"Threats and counter-threats are not conducive to these kinds of negotiations," he told reporters. "So I appeal to everyone to restrain themselves and give the process a chance."

The three U.N. envoys are due in Baghdad Tuesday. They're expected to remain for two days before returning to brief the Security Council on Monday.

In Baghdad, some 55,000 Iraqis gathered for a soccer game at Al-Shaab Stadium that was preceded by rally with chants of "Down with America."

Iraq's turning back of the U.N. weapons inspectors Tuesday was a repeat of Monday's action, when a missile team with at least one American was denied entry to a site.

"Today we went with our inspection teams to separate sites," said Maj. Gen. Nils Carlstrom, the Swedish head of the U.N. monitoring office in Baghdad. "All three teams were told they can continue their inspections, but without Americans."

He said the team leaders cancelled the inspections and returned to headquarters.

The inspectors are part of the U.N. Special Commission, which is responsible for monitoring the elimination of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction.

Iraq claims it has destroyed its weapons and dismantled the programs to build them, but U.N. inspectors repeatedly have said Iraq is withholding key information.

Also Tuesday, high ranking U.S. State Department officia, Martin Indyk continued his tour of Gulf states seeking support for a firm U.N. stand on the dispute.

"The united will of the Security Council is that Saddam should understand that he has no alternative but to comply," Indyk said during a stop in the Qatar capital, Doha. He later traveled to Kuwait.

Saddam, in remarks published Monday, called for "a dialogue" that would lead to the Security Council setting a date for lifting the sanctions.

On Tuesday, the speaker of the Iraqi parliament, Sadoun Hamadi, called for international support for Iraq's stance, saying that the U.N. inspection panel "has been transformed into a political tool for the United States' schemes to prolong the blockade."

SPY

inspectors, their expertise is crucial to many of the missions.

The United States' "biotech industry is 10 times that of the rest of the world," Trevan said. "It is not a luxury to have the United States, it is a requirement."

Iraq has had a long history of obstructing inspections, and confrontations occasionally have turned hostile.

In July 1992, Iraqi officials threatened inspectors during a three-week standoff outside the Agriculture Ministry, where inspectors believed documents on long-range missiles were hidden.

"Gunshots were fired into the air to intimidate inspectors," Trevan said. "Stones and vegetables were thrown at inspectors, and there was an attempted stabbing of an inspector."

The threats, the inspectors say, are part of a deliberate policy.

"As soon as they got close to something, the Iraqis would start to physically obstruct the inspection," Trevan said.

In other instances, monitors have accused Iraq of loading banned material into rail cars and trucks, then shuttling it around the country to frustrate inspectors.

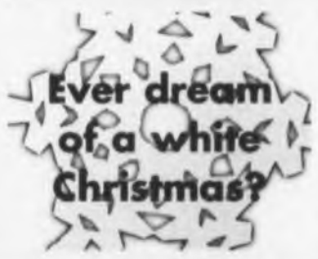
Inspectors also have watched smoke rise from buildings suspected of housing crucial documents while officials forced them to stay back.

Weapons monitoring is not all high drama. U.N. inspectors comb through thousands of pages of documents trying to meticulously piece together details of past programs to build chemical and biological weapons and long-range missiles.

In the process, inspectors have uncovered at least one experimental Iraqi program to isolate weapons-grade plutonium and have supervised the destruction of 125,000 gallons of chemical weapons.

Iraq also has admitted under pressure to having produced 130,000 gallons of botulism and anthrax, toxins it says it destroyed before the Gulf War.

Hussein has dismissed allegations that Iraq is withholding information on its banned weapons programs as "excuses used in order to prolong the sanctions" and has compared Iraq to "an occupied country."



Rolf Ekeus, the former head of weapons inspection and now Sweden's ambassador to Washington, expressed frustration at Iraqi attempts to counter inspectors' reports that some weapons have not been destroyed.

"They try to say that the reason that the commission is saying that is that they have an extracurricular task — dethroning Saddam Hussein," Ekeus said in a telephone interview.

Many experts also brush aside Hussein's protests, saying the sanctions could have been lifted if he had cooperated with the inspectors.

"It is absolutely vital that ... we find the missing Scud missiles that we know are there and if his biological weapons program is advanced," said Paul Beaver, a spokesman with Jane's Defense in London. "Without this, I don't think the world can consider itself to be safe."

CLASSIFIED AD WRITING TIPS
- List items or services first. Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.
- Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.
- Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

Federal guidelines to affect Kansas meat plants

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — [State Agriculture] Secretary Allie De[vine] is confident small meat [proces]sing plants in Kansas — with the [state's] help — will meet new federal regulations to ensure purity of their products for sale out of state.

"There is a strong commitment by this administration and other involved entities to make Kansas a leader in providing support and assistance to its small meat-processing businesses," she told the Joint Committee on Economic Development during a Statehouse hearing on Tuesday.

"We will be confident of the quality of our products and sure of consumer confidence in Kansas-grown and processed meat and poultry."

However, she added, "For our state meat plants to be competitive with other states and foreign imports, we must do a better job."

Devine said she ordered a peer review of the state program, a systems analysis of the meat and poultry inspection process, improved communication with the meat industry and a review of ways the state can help the industry deal with new regulations.

As a result, she said, the inspection team in her department is being realigned and the state plan is being rewritten.

Devine testified as the committee reviewed Kansas' meat inspection program in light of reforms being initiated in the meat inspection system.

The intent is to change the focus of inspection efforts from animal disease detection to an assessment of the risks posed by food-borne microorganisms.

Kansas, which has 141 state-inspected meat processing facilities, 16 custom exempt plants and 46 registered federal plants, which all must have a state license. In the fiscal year that ended June 30, plants under state inspection slaughtered 42,300 cattle, 38,770 hogs and 9,500 chickens.

The Agriculture Department has handled the state's meat inspection program since the Legislature passed the Meat and Poultry Inspection Act in 1969. Before that, the state Health Department did the inspections.

Kansas is one of 26 states that maintains its own inspection programs, but new federal regulations require greater attention to adulteration of meat and poultry products.

Now the plants will come under written federal standard operating procedures for sanitation, sampling and testing, as well as new food safety programs.

AUCTION

The rather low bidding throughout the auction is perhaps evidence of an uncertainty existing in the local art market.

The low bidding on many of the works could be evidence of a reluctance to place too much value on local art. However, there were some predictably high bids although far below market value.

Dean Mitchell's "Renaissance Girl," a watercolor from his Renaissance Fair series, went for $1,350 — respectable, but a bargain by gallery standards.

Tom Edwards' "Three Houses/Midnight State," an exquisitely framed intaglio, went for a mere $95 — well below market standards for the frame alone.

Manhattan favorite Jim Munce's "St. Francis Reminding the Sow of Her Loveliness," an intaglio, went for $340, at least half-price.

So where were the art collectors who are so willing to buy at full-price from galleries, but apparently won't pay much at auction? Is the Manhattan region cheap?

Two circular prints by New York artist Alan Shields went for about $1,000, a good price and an illustration of collectors' desires to own something that is proven in international markets and the museum world.

The George Bellows print "Martinicus," expected to draw large interest, went for $1,000. New York artist Doug Martin, who recently visited campus, sold "Sanctuary," a block print, for $250. It's doubtful one could find prices this low in a New York gallery.

Although art collectors walked out with amazingly underpriced bargains, the spirit of the evening was giving to the art department scholarship fund.

Laura Fatemi, an auction organizer and assistant gallery manager at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art, said the auction set a record in that no other auction had seen prices more than $1,000.

"They went higher than we expected," Fatemi said.

Anna Holcombe, art department head, echoed Fatemi's enthusiasm. Holcombe said the auction raised more money than expected and she was surprised to see so many new faces at an art event.

Because it was a charity auction — market-driven art auctions are pretty much nonexistent in Kansas — the prices perhaps don't accurately reflect the market.

In this case, that's only good news to the collector.

POPES

you out of your seat kicking and screaming and make you dance along with its infectious beat. The lyrics are all about different things relating to love like "Let's hear it for heartache. Let's hear it for pain."

There's even a sly reference to sex with the lyric "Let's hear it for cigarettes. Baby, you were great."

That is the best song on the entire record.

"Pure Imagination" carries the Morrissey and Smiths influence one step further by sounding almost like an outtake from one of their albums. The solo sounds a lot like a theremin and not a guitar.

Tracks 13 and 14 sound like one song split into two.

"They Lied" is a cool acoustic song, incredibly catchy with its muted riffs. Then, all of a sudden, it stops on a dime and explodes into "End Of Your Time."

"Pretty Pathetic" is a depressing song about getting dumped and being depressed about it. It's a very appropriate title for the feel of the song. It's a great song. Depressing, but great.

The Popes close the album with "Follow The Sound," a very poppy ballad that features a slightly Latin-influenced guitar solo.

This is a virtually flawless record and is one of my favorite albums of 1997. That's a pretty bold statement to make, but it's a fantastic album.

The Smoking Popes are opening for the one and only Morrissey tonight at Liberty Hall in Lawrence. It's a match made in heaven.

The show is sold out, however, so if you don't have tickets, be prepared to pay outrageous prices to a scalper if you want to go.

It will be worth it, though.

Biotech building to offer modern facilities

AMY BICKEL
staff reporter

Kansas Board of Regents approved a plan to construct a new biotechnology building addition to Ackert Hall.

The Division of Biology and the Department of Biochemistry will have new facilities in the building. Also, the Center for Basic Cancer Research will have an office unit.

"The biotechnology building is the current number one construction priority of Kansas State University," President Jon Wefald said. "The Division of Biology, the Department of Biochemistry and the Center for Basic Cancer Research will benefit from the updated facilities."

The 55,000-square-foot building will provide modern research laboratories and more space for modern molecular and cellular biological research.

Cost of the new building is projected at $11 million. The state of Kansas contributed to more than half the project, and the rest will be funded through federal and private resources. Construction will begin during fall 1999, Brian Spooner, Division of Biology director, said.

"The Division of Biology brings in over $7 million each year in research grants," Spooner said. "We are doing world-class research in a less than world-class facility. To be able to compete — this expansion is going to help with that."

K-State will continue to have leading scientists because of the updated facility. Undergraduates, working with faculty members doing research for the federal government, will have an unusual learning opportunity, he said.

The Center for Basic Cancer Research's unit will focus on education, fund raising and publicizing the cancer-relevant basic research conducted by K-State biotechnology faculty.

"I'm very excited by this potential building," Spooner said. "This allows us to continue to compete and conduct research for people of Kansas and the nation."

A TALE OF 2 COMPUTER LABS

Computer labs face differences in funding

STORY BY LESLIE NACHTRAB

Behind the door of Denison 116, 19 Macintosh computers serve nearly 1,000 students taking writing courses each semester through the Department of English. The single service available to students is a word-processing program, MacWrite II.

South of Denison Hall, 19 computers are used in Kedzie 106 by about 250 students enrolled in journalism and mass communications courses. There, students have access to a multitude of programs and services — the Internet, graphic-design programs and word-processing programs.

The English department and the A. Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications represent the differences in upgrading technology and funding for computer labs within departments in the College of Arts and Sciences.

The English department is feeling the pressure of student numbers.

Irene Ward, director of expository writing and assistant professor of English, estimates thousands of students enrolled in writing courses use the 20 terminals. Ward said classes range from the 100-level courses to the 500-level courses.

Ward said the problem with the lab is it hasn't seen any upgrades in recent years.

"We're not very satisfied," Ward said.

Craig Stroupe, English instructor, said the English department is doing its best to use the technology it has available. However, he said he would like to see upgrades in the lab.

"There are so many possibilities out there," he said. "There's a lot of potential we could be using with a lab upgrade."

The journalism school is seeing happier times with its labs.

The school has a 19-computer lab in Kedzie 106, a six-computer lab in the Kedzie library and a lab in Kedzie 208 used by students during class time.

"The labs have been pretty much state-of-the-art the past two years," said Todd Simon, director of the school.

Simon said the school is making several upgrades, which students might not see easily.

"We're adding new versions to the main programs used in the courses," Simon said. "We're also upgrading memory, which could be installing as we speak."

The math and physics departments share a lab in the basement of Cardwell Hall. There, 15 terminals are available for students taking math and physics courses.

Andy Bennett, associate professor of mathematics, said engineering students who are

El-Ghori

Grimes

Ali Kanso El-Ghori said he wants to return to work at K-State. He said the faculty of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications has a great reputation, and he respects and is friends with many faculty members.

Unfortunately, he said, he doesn't have much choice about it right now.

El-Ghori was denied tenure in December 1995 and is suing the university, the dean of Arts and Sciences and two mass communications professors. The suit demands his tenure be granted and that he receive $1 million in damages.

Tom Grimes, associate professor of journalism, is the first defendant named in El-Ghori's suit, filed Oct. 15 in U.S. District Court of Wichita. The suit charges that Grimes, along with fellow associate professor Charles Pearce, sent unfounded assessments of El-Ghori's teaching and research abilities to the tenure board, which directly resulted in his denial of tenure.

Jennifer Kassebaum is the attorney assigned by the university attorney's office. She said she is prepared to deny all the allegations raised in the suit, which she believes are without merit.

"There is nothing unlawful about Dr. El-Ghori's denial of tenure," she said.

El-Ghori said he disagreed. Now living and working near Boston University, he said the letters Grimes wrote to the tenure board were false and defamatory.

In the letters, according to El-Ghori's suit, Grimes identified himself as El-Ghori's mentor in the tenure process and had witnessed El-Ghori's teaching first-hand. Furthermore, Grimes' opinion was that El-Ghori's research was "amateurish" and included false information.

El-Ghori said Grimes never attended one of his classes, and Pearce was his mentor. As for his research, El-Ghori said Grimes had no basis to make judgments.

"We don't even have the same specialty," he said.

Grimes is head electronic journalism teacher at K-State and has written and co-written several analyses in peer-reviewed journals, primarily on the psychology and perception of TV news.

El-Ghori, while once a reporter and editor in his native Lebanon, has since worked primarily in the fields of advertising and public relations, particularly in regard to various cultures. His work has appeared in The Journal of Advertising Research, considered the top publication in the field.

Grimes, Pearce and Peter Nicholls, dean of arts and sciences, all declined comment, by counsel of their attorney.

El-Ghori said he'd like to return to K-State, not only because of his work, but because he and his wife are trying to start a family and consider Manhattan a good place for it.

As for his relationship with K-State, El-Ghori said he isn't worried, particularly in regard to Grimes.

"Grimes has never been an obstacle for me to work effectively," he said.

DEALING WITH RECOMMENDATIONS

Task force releases funding proposal

▶ What happens next?

The Task Force to Plan for the Library of the Twenty-First Century will present its recommendations in an open forum Friday.

Faculty Senate President Jim Legg said the meeting will be in the Union Little Theatre from noon to 1:30 p.m. Open to the public, it will be a chance for everyone to hear the committee's recommendations and ask questions, he said.

"Things such as the forum are very important for faculty, students and administration to say, 'Just how seriously do we take the library?'" Legg said.

From there, he said officials will most likely follow the task force's recommendation to appoint a long-range committee to oversee the implementation of its recommendations.

"It will be an ongoing process. The task force has recommended that the provost and I jointly appoint a long-range committee to take over the whole task," Legg said. "I would assume that the committee would be a very important part in the whole thing."

▶ REPORT RECOMMENDS WAYS TO fund rising periodical subscriptions.

A recent report by a campus task force is drawing mixed reviews from students, faculty and administration.

The Task Force to Plan for Financing the Library of the Twenty-First Century issued a 26-page report late last week. Their document presents recommendations to solve funding shortages at Hale Library.

Prepared by the 16-member task force and submitted to several key university officials, the report lists three main funding sources to combat inflationary prices of periodical subscriptions.

Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock said the report will help the university move toward a solution.

"The task force's report is a real important thing for the library and the whole university. We need to study it carefully and implement it as fully as possible," Hobrock said.

The report separates funding solutions into two categories — short- and long-term. Short-term recommendations include the majority of university cost centers contributing $100,000 to the library in 1997-98 and 1998-99. The president and provost's offices will contribute $50,000 per year.

According to the report, remaining shortfalls in the periodical budget could be funded through empty faculty lines, graduate teaching assistant salaries and use of Other Operating Expenses funds. A further cut in serial subscriptions is also a possibility.

President Jon Wefald said the task force's short-term recommendations will become a reality.

"The short-term recommendations are given. We are going to do those. Everyone has agreed that 'A, B and C' are going to be done," he said.

Long-term solutions posed in the task-force report are more complex, however, and have yet to be initiated.

The report lists three large sources of long-term funding for library periodicals: an increase in state funding, a $10 million KSU Foundation endowment fund and a $2 per-credit-hour privilege fee.

Task Force Chair Cynthia McCahon said those three recommendations are necessary to help the library improve on its ranking of last in the Big 12.

"We would need to have all three sources in order to start making a dent in our status in the Big 12," she said.

STUDENT PRIVILEGE FEE

Student funding for the library would be accomplished through one of the task force's recommendations. An approximate $2 per-credit-hour fee would generate $720,000 per year for the library.

Wefald said he hopes students will consider a library fee.

"I certainly would be very pleased if the students could find the way ... to support a fee. To me, the library funding is our number one priority," he said. "We see the student fee as just one part of the multiple sources of funds that we would be looking at."

Though other fee considerations, such as a possible stadium-expansion fee, are on the table, Wefald said he hopes students will consider library materials as an important issue.

"Certainly it would be nice to have more seats in the stadium, but to me, by far, the library is the most important thing if students are going to put more money into anything," he said. "If you don't have a good or great library, that is a very, very difficult situation."

But some Student Governing Association leaders don't share Wefald's outlook on a new fee.

"We put $5.5 million into a building that the administration on this campus never even considered how to fill," Governmental Relations Chair Patrick Carney said. "That's ridiculous. They should go somewhere else for their money."

Arts and Sciences Sen. Mandy Reese said she agreed.

"I will oppose a student fee vehemently," she said. "That is absolutely outrageous."

If the library were to receive other funding from the recommendations, such as an increase in state funds and a Foundation endowment, McCahon conceded that a $2 fee wouldn't be Pennies add up to dollars.

Thousands add up to make millions.

If recommendations by the Task Force to Plan for Financing the Library of the Twenty-First Century become reality, those millions could help Hale Library out of a significant financial shortage.

The committee's report, released late last week, highlights an increase in state funds, a KSU Foundation endowment and a student privilege fee as solutions to inflation of periodical subscription prices.

But the document also includes several smaller-scale ideas thought of by the committee that could help the library.

"We went through a brainstorming session to try to generate creative ideas for funding. We wanted to mention them maybe not as things that would crystallize during the short term, but that might be considered later," Task Force Chair Cynthia McCahon said.

Judge denies medical-use defense on author's marijuana charge

ROMULUS, Mich. — A judge Wednesday reversed herself and told best-selling author Peter McWilliams he cannot claim medical necessity as a defense in a marijuana possession case.

McWilliams is co-author of "Hypericum & Depression," which hit best-seller lists in August. He was arrested on the marijuana charge last December at Detroit Metropolitan Airport.

He has said marijuana eases his nausea during chemotherapy for non-Hodgkins lymphoma and helps him tolerate the drugs he takes to control AIDS.

On Oct. 29, Romulus District Court Judge Tina Green gave his lawyer permission to base the defense, in part, on McWilliams' medical use of the marijuana.

But after reviewing case law, Green said Wednesday that McWilliams does not meet the test required for such a defense — that he faced death or serious bodily harm if he did not use the drug.

Father who killed his infant son receives only probation sentence

INDEPENDENCE, Mo. — A judge's decision to put a man on probation after he admitted shaking his baby son to death has outraged prosecutors.

Eric J. Coffey, 21, had pleaded guilty to shaking his 3-month-old son to death in frustration because the boy would not quit crying.

On Tuesday, Jackson County Circuit Judge Jack Gant sentenced Coffey to probation and told him to attend classes on anger control and parenting.

Prosecutor Claire McCaskill had asked that Coffey be sentenced to 20 years and said she was very sad and depressed by Gant's decision.

"This is a case where a father has admitted guilt, and he killed a helpless child," McCaskill said. "If our system is not capable of punishing this man, then our system is failing and failing dramatically."

But Gant said he felt Coffey and his family have had enough tragedy, and if the family could forgive him, then perhaps society should, too.

Coffey pleaded guilty in August to second-degree murder in the Feb. 4 death of Dalton T. Coffey. Coffey told police he got up in the night because Dalton was crying. He said he shook the baby, and then returned to bed. In the morning, Dalton was dead.

Kansas dentist makes sweet deal for children's Halloween snacks

LAWRENCE — Giving up Halloween candy to save your teeth might be the right thing to do. But it's not always the easy thing to do, which is why a Lawrence dentist is willing to sweeten the proposition for his younger patients.

Dr. Jim Otten offered kids $1 a pound for any sugary treats turned in to his office. On Monday, about 20 people took him up on the offer.

Otten said he started the buy-back program to promote healthier teeth.

His office collected about 40 pounds of candy on Monday.

Eric McCarthy, 5, received $6 for the six pounds of candy he collected while trick-or-treating.

"His sister was a little bit harder than he was" in giving up the sweets, Debbie McCarthy, mother of the pair, said.

Emily McCarthy, 8, also had six pounds, but she chose to cash in only three.

What is Otten going to do with all that candy he paid for?

"Throw it out," he said.

40,000 expected for dedication of A&M's Bush presidential library

COLLEGE STATION, Texas — George Bush is a little uneasy about the opening of his presidential library today. Not comfortable with that sort of thing. Wasn't raised to brag. Wouldn't be right.

About 40,000 people were invited to the dedication ceremonies at Texas A&M University in College Station, some 85 miles northwest of Houston, where Bush now lives.

Among the dignitaries will be President and Hillary Rodham Clinton; former Presidents Jimmy Carter and Gerald Ford and their wives; Nancy Reagan; and Lady Bird Johnson. Also on hand will be more than 60 members of Bush's family, ranging from infant grandchildren Georgette and Robert to Uncle Lou and Aunt Grace Walker, both in their 90s.

The $80 million library, museum and school of government on the site of what was once a Texas A&M hog farm chronicles Bush's life from infancy to the present, with an emphasis, of course, on his presidency from 1989 to 1993.

Green space takes center stage in expansion talks

BRANDON WHITE/Collegian

THE PLAN for expanding Anderson Avenue calls for two houses on the corner of Anderson and Sunset avenues to be removed to widen the turning radius.

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

K-State was laid out as an arboretum — a campus dotted with a variety of tree species that, up until the 1960s at least, was more of a small village than a modern campus.

Over the years, buildings have been added to the central campus that have redefined the traditional green spaces. Recently, the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art forever changed the small tree grove south of McCain Auditorium. The subsequent fencing-off of open space in the area further altered the shaded lawn.

With the city's plans to widen Anderson Avenue using up to 30 feet of the university's southern edge, green space and campus image have taken center stage in the arguments of both sides of the issue.

The project calls for the removal of 180 trees along Anderson. It also coincides with the planned construction of an alumni center on the northeast corner of Anderson and Denison avenues on what is now open space.

The city of Manhattan is a self-declared tree city, so the green issues are as much about identity as they are about traffic flow.

Although the project would remove trees, there is a commitment by the city to replace and upgrade spaces. The city hired Tom Hittle, of Hittle Landscape Architects, nearly a year ago to develop the green side of the project.

Hittle is a 1973 K-State graduate in horticulture who received his master's from K-State in 1980. He has developed a number of landscape concepts along the Anderson corridor.

Hittle said his design began by sending a questionnaire to residents who live along Anderson, city employees, university officials and members of the steering committee overseeing the Anderson widening. He then developed his design based on those comments and questions.

Anderson Ave Expansion

Key to Hittle's design has been to restore the corridor to a green belt with a harmonious design encompassing a variety of trees, shrubs and landscape elements.

"The project is going to fund the planting of new materials to re-establish that Anderson Avenue green belt," Hittle said.

Hittle said the existing trees are limited in the number of species. He said a goal of the project is to increase the variety of species so as to defend against disease and insects wiping out entire species and ruining the corridor.

As an example, Hittle said the trees along the northern edge of Anderson south of Memorial Stadium will have to come out for the widening and storm-sewer project. Those trees are ash and walnut.

"Going back in their place are some oaks, maple, redbud, linden and newer varieties of ash," Hittle said. "That's something that I think is a real positive aspect of the project."

Another design concept central to the project are the community gardens planned for the southeast and southwest corners of Sunset and Anderson avenues. Those lots will become open after the two existing houses are removed to widen the turning radii.

Hittle said the gardens will be simple turf areas that will feature a variety of trees and limestone outcroppings.

He said the project has been complex because it includes so many different usage areas the city has identified: the community green space, residential building areas, commercial building areas, KSU Memorial Stadium, K-State Student Union south parking lot and the area south of Nichols and Thompson halls.

Jack Messer, city engineer, said the Anderson project represents one of the largest green projects the city has undertaken.

"The community indicated the landscape part of the project was important," Messer said. "It became obvious we were going to have to take some significant measures."

Jerry Carter, director of facilities planning and university architect, said the city will replace the limestone wall south of Nichols Hall, remove and replace the gate on Mid Campus Drive and Anderson, and replant trees and shrubs.

"That's the city's responsibility," Carter said.

He said the university has also asked the city to build a new stone wall further to the west of the Nichols wall along the south Union parking lot.

Richard Allen, park planner with the department of parks and recreation, said the city's plans to include a green space on the southwest corner of Anderson and Sunset would replace a house, which will be removed.

Allen said he and other city staff have given the city's landscape consultant input about creating a low-maintenance green space.

Ken Brooks, professor of landscape architecture, said the Anderson widening project could mean the addition of more and better trees to the Anderson corridor.

"We've already lost some of the trees along there due to older species, disease and the strenuous environment of urban situations," Brooks said. "If we do nothing, there are a number of trees that will decline or be lost in another 20 years."

Brooks said by developing a comprehensive tree replacement program, in 20 years the corridor's trees could actually be healthier and shape the area's space in a more esthetically pleasing way.

"Trees are renewable," Brooks said.

Rick Forsyth, professor of landscape architecture, said a community with many mature trees is healthier.

"Image is very important to both prospective students and attracting businesses," Forsyth said, referring to the small-town qualities of K-State. "I think the open spaces on this campus are being eroded away. The last two decades of erosion of trees is amazing."

Forsyth said the replanting of smaller trees on less space would not enhance the beauty of the campus. He said the planned alumni center should also maintain vistas from the streets to the campus.

For example, from the intersection of Anderson and Denison, a driver can easily see the Anderson Hall belltower, Seaton Hall and the peak of a Hale Library tower.

"Passengers like to see that vista," Forsyth said. "It's what gives people an impression. They are visual orientation points. They are also attractive and make you want to enter and see what the place is like. Good designers tend to be sensitive to those issues."

K-State to get ag funding

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Farmland Industries Inc. and K-State have formed a five-year partnership they say is the first of its kind between an agribusiness company and a land-grant university.

Harry Cleberg, Farmland's president and CEO, and Marc Johnson, dean of the College of agriculture, announced the alliance Tuesday in Manhattan.

"The secret behind North America's global leadership in agribusiness and food is the research by land-grant universities and by agribusinesses," Cleberg said. "To keep our competitive edge globally, it is essential that our land-grant system and agribusiness leaders work shoulder-to-shoulder solving the challenges we face in a rapidly growing world population."

The project, to be known as the Research Alliance, will fund agricultural research through K-State's Agricultural Experiment Station and Cooperative Extension Service.

Cleberg said Farmland, North America's largest farmer-owned cooperative, will contribute $300,000 annually to the university. It will be one of K-State's Research and Extension's largest unrestricted grants from a private source, Research Alliance officials said.

The Research Alliance will also involve other agribusinesses and land-grant institutions working in special research teams, organizers said.

Farmland Industries, based in Kansas City, Mo., is the largest agriculture supply and marketing cooperative in North America, with company sales of $9.1 billion in 1997.

Man declared incompetent found attending university

ASSOCIATED PRESS

HARTFORD, Conn. — Authorities lost track of Kenneth Curtis after he was declared mentally incompetent to stand trial in the 1987 slaying of his former girlfriend. When they finally caught up to him, he was taking pre-med classes in college — and earning a B-plus average.

In the wake of his recapture Tuesday, the victim's family and others questioned how he could have gone on with his life without anyone checking to see if his condition had improved enough to face prosecution.

Curtis, 32, avoided a trial because of a brain injury he suffered when he shot himself in the head after allegedly shooting 21-year-old Donna Kalson in October 1987.

"If he's so incompetent, how can he go to school?" asked Kalson's mother, Barbara. "How many more people are out there like him ... who have slipped through the cracks?"

Some blamed a loophole in the law, including Chief State's Attorney John Bailey and other prosecutors. They plan to propose legislation to require periodic psychiatric evaluations for people who are released after being declared incompetent.

"We can't have this happen again," Bailey said.

Curtis was released from custody in June 1989 after a judge found him incompetent and ruled there was "no substantial probability" he would regain competency.

Curtis is accused of shooting Kalson in the head outside a restaurant, wounding her date, then shooting himself in the head.

Curtis, who was paralyzed in the shooting, was hospitalized for almost seven months, and still must use a wheelchair.

At his competency hearing in 1989, four psychiatrists who examined Curtis said he had suffered brain damage and was incapable of even talking with his lawyers. They said he had also suffered complete amnesia about the shooting and was unlikely to ever be mentally competent enough to stand trial.

He was freed and ordered to undergo annual psychiatric evaluations. But the state Appellate Court — over the objections of prosecutors — overturned that order in 1990, allowing Curtis to go without monitoring.

Library fee needs intensive study; university should prioritize

There's been a lot of talk by students, faculty and administration about Hale Library's funding problems.

Late last week, the Task Force to Plan for Financing the Library Funding of the Twenty-First Century released its long-term solutions report. Among those options was a proposed student fee to help fund the purchase of monographs and periodicals.

You can find out more about the report and discuss concerns at an open forum from noon to 1:30 p.m. on Friday in the Union Little Theatre.

But before anyone gets too keen on proposing a fee, however, more details need to be worked out. There needs to be firm commitment by the KSU Foundation to raise funds for the library. The state Legislature also needs to step up to bat with reasonable financial support — something they haven't been giving K-State for decades and a reason we rank last in Big 12 libraries.

Response to the report has been somewhat mixed. Gary Hellebust, president and chief executive officer of the Foundation, said raising money for the library's resources is "one of those do or don't kind of things. If we aggressively start utilizing funds from other areas it will be at the detriment of scholarships and a variety of other things. We have to have a balancing act. We have no disagreement the library needs support. That's very obvious, it's just a matter of how you go about doing it."

Hellebust makes a good point. All the university's fund-raising resources shouldn't go to the library. At the same time, his point illustrates how projects like the alumni center can adversely affect fund raising for other projects. K-State has a limited range of private funds available to it, which makes the need for prioritization urgent.

Do we need a new building for alumni to socialize in or do we need more books? Would Colbert Hills have been better off as the Colbert Social Sciences section of Hale Library?

The task force's report only offers recommendations, as per its mission, and doesn't suggest how to implement them. The phase of implementation should begin immediately with another faculty-student committee.

The talk has been talked, now it's time to walk the walk.

Stadium expansion

Athletic department cares about your money, not your opinion

It was 1989, and K-State football sucked. I mean it really sucked. Bad. We had the longest-running losing streak and the longest-running non-winning streak in the NCAA.

Lucky for us, there was North Texas State University.

I can't remember the score of that fateful game in the fall of my freshman year (I took a six-year hiatus funded by the U.S. Navy, in case you're wondering), but I remember that even though North Texas State's players looked like a high school team compared with our Wildcats, it was a close game. NTSU promptly changed its name to the University of North Texas to avoid being recognized.

Maybe I shouldn't tell you this, because I'm not sure if there is a statute of limitations on football-induced vandalism, but at the end of the game, yelling myself hoarse, I joined my fellow Wildcat fans in tearing down the goal posts, dragging a portion of them then to Aggieville and drinking like Vikings over our acquisition.

I tell you this story only to assure you I love football as much as the next guy. That like most true fans, I cheered like it was V-J day when the Cats won the Cotton Bowl. That having been said, I would like to throw in my two cents against the expansion of the football stadium.

To be honest, I have been indifferent to the expansion issue. It has been the source of some pretty good debate in the Collegian newsroom, to be sure, but I had decided not to write about it.

That was before the handouts provided by the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics table in the K-State Student Union showed me not only how this expansion would not only benefit few students, but would also be, for the most part, pointless.

I thought that the 10,000 student seats would add 2,500 to the 7,500 already occupied. I did not realize until Mike O'Brien, associate athletic director of development, pointed out to me that this year 9,471 students already attend the games on season tickets (9,958 last year), so we would really be adding around 500 seats for students all-together.

Sure, those seats are in bleachers or chairs, but even with the expansion, the added seats will still be bastard-stepchild seating in the corner of the end zone. The point is, we've already got seats that can work until we get some other things taken care of, but we'll get back to that.

Another thing the athletic department was kind enough to point out with its handouts is my "benefit" as a student, which to them only shows up in the "Recent Graduate Tickets," a plan to give graduates 33 percent off their season tickets for two years after they graduate.

They say, for example, that as a junior, I will spend $24, yet save $60 on season tickets for two years after I graduate, my total benefit being $96. If you really skim their paperwork, however, you will find that only the first 1,000 recent graduates will receive this benefit. This means in two years I would be competing with about 8,000 alumni for those seats. Even for a guy like me, who has nearly lost the ability to do simple math in his head, it's pretty obvious the great majority of students will never receive this benefit.

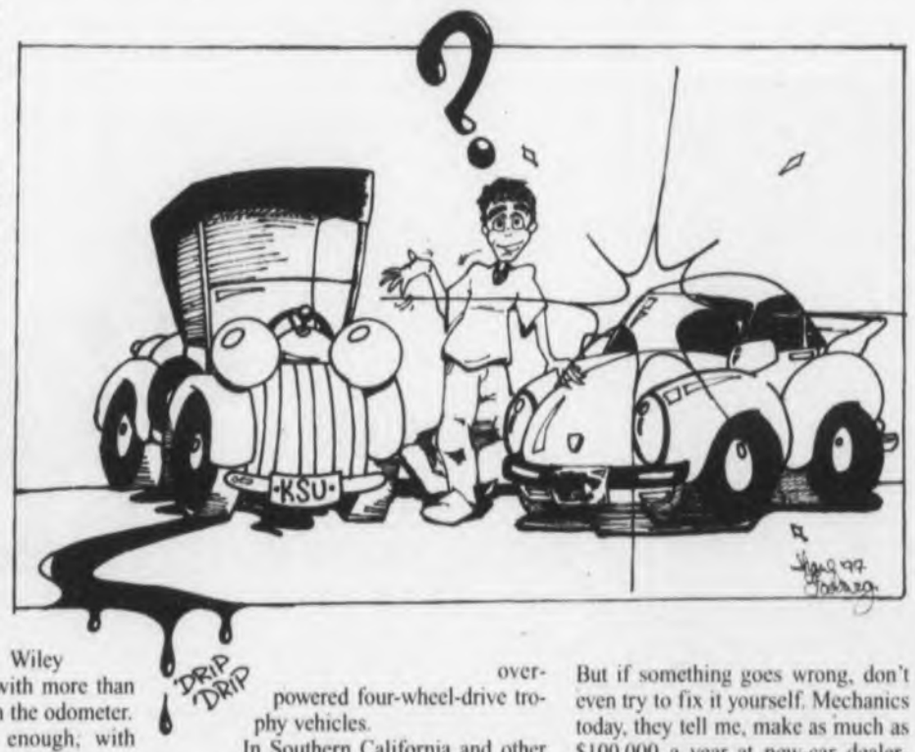
One thing O'Brien couldn't tell me was how much the expansion would cost if the student seating weren't included (they actually have no firm price on the expansion as a whole yet) and just the suites and press box additions were built.

But when you consider those other expansion priorities, when you really listen to what these athletic department people are saying, you realize they are unconcerned with the student body. Not with our money, just us as living, breathing entities who would like to watch a football game now and then.

Athletic Director Max Urick said during an interview some time ago those other expansion projects will get built regardless of how students vote on the issue. Urick isn't an academic, he's a money man. That's why he was hired, so he can't be blamed when he implies students can go to hell if they won't pony up for seats.

The funny thing is the word "student" keeps popping up. I don't want to get into the argument as to whether an academic institution should be so concerned with sports, but the fact is this school does have some other funding issues they should be considering at this point, including the academic journal funding problem. You and I are going to be asked to help out with that, too, and we should. The stadium expansion is unnecessary at this time.

If you have a fire in your house — even a small one — and a limited amount of water, you deal with the fire. You don't make soup.



Modern automobiles lack individuality, oil leaks

There have been seven ages in the history of automobiles. The birth of the car was just an exercise in upgrading transportation and covered more than 100 years, from the steam-propelled gun carriage built in 1769 by Nicolas-Joseph Cugnot in France to the gasoline-driven horseless carriage made in 1886 by Karl Benz of Germany.

In 1901, American Ransom Eli Olds produced the first autos in volume (1,500 of them). Then the mass production of Henry Ford's identical black Model Ts came in 1908.

More colorful, and quite different, models made their appearance from the 1920s until World War II. Next were the big, powerful and wild American highway years, from the 1950s into the 1970s. That eventful history merged into one of global quality. Better and better mass cars were designed in the wind tunnels for the interchangeable masses.

That is as it should be. The new cars are almost perfect compared with what some of us grew up with. Of course, that might be our problem. They purr. They handle like dreams. But their predictability unreasonably makes us long for a past when every car and driver had a story. Now what can you say if anyone asks about a long drive? "Fine. No problem." The last time I fixed a flat tire was probably in 1985, and that was when I was a kid.

One day, people could open the hoods of their cars and understand what they saw — they knew how it worked and when it was broken, not an uncommon occurrence. They could fix it, or thought they could.

Then, suddenly, they could not understand it. If it stopped, the sensible thing to do was to call an 800 number.

I did not grow up in a car culture. Only five students in my high school class owned cars. I did not even bother to get a driver's license until I was 16 and had earned enough to buy a 1947 Wiley Jeep for $200 with more than 100,000 miles on the odometer.

I did know enough, with help from an archipelago of junkyards, to keep the rolling wounded on the road, nursing a succession of what are now called "previously owned" cars.

It was, as promised, a freedom machine, an opportunity machine, taking me to places without borders.

Times and people changed. The small cars sent messages both technological and political — small became beautiful, protecting the environment, saving fuel and celebrating work.

Eccentricity aside, a Cadillac still meant success, gaudier than in the past, and so did a Corvette and, of course, a Mercedes-Benz.

A Volkswagen van symbolized four new freedoms — mobile, economic, chemical and biological.

A Volvo, from Sweden of all places, meant family, safety, solidness — with a touch of class.

The Volvos were traded in for Land Rovers and other oversized and overpowered four-wheel-drive trophy vehicles.

In Southern California and other big places, there is a full-service car culture: Little House on the Freeway with phone, fax, refrigerator and laptop.

Up north, in Silicon Valley, the cars are just as expensive, but the message is different. Engineering is the message and the executives buy BMW and Lexus. Quality transportation that works with the efficiency of a computer.

Which is pretty much what they are. They are safer and infinitely more reliable than their predecessors. My passion for simplicity was real, but so was the pain and expense of lube jobs every 1,000 miles or oil changes every 5,000. The reason guys like me spent so much time under cars or in Pep Boys auto parts stores was that things snapped, leaked and wore out with tedious predictability. They don't make them like they used to, and thank God for that.

But if something goes wrong, don't even try to fix it yourself. Mechanics today, they tell me, make as much as $100,000 a year at new-car dealerships. More power to them. Instead of me lying on my back, legs folded over the front seat, feeling my dim way along yellow wires and Phillips-head screws, professionals plug laptops into ports behind the dashboard — people who spend half their time keeping up and taking refresher courses, the way brain surgeons do.

If better and better sameness is both the beginning and the future of cars — and I think it is — I might be a bit ahead of my time. I am older now and perhaps wiser, choosing good solid transportation rather than the romantic and true pleasures of stainless looks, luxury and lasers of the cars in those two-minute warning car commercials.

In the good old days, I could always find my car in a parking lot, sometimes by following the oil trail. Now there's a problem. All the cars are so shiny and so sleek I have trouble remembering which one is mine.

K-State fraternities should ban alcohol from houses

Editor,

As a member of the greek system, I have been embarrassed by the number of alcohol-related deaths in other greek communities throughout the nation. I think it's time for the K-State greek system to take a stand against the blatant use of alcohol.

In my opinion, the only choice is for fraternities to go dry. The abuse of alcohol has claimed far too many lives in today's college environment.

It's time for the other K-State fraternities to follow the example set by Sigma Nu, Phi Delta Theta and Phi Gamma Delta. Although this might seem extreme, I'd rather give up drinking in our house than lose one of my brothers.

Maintenance of crosswalks needed for pedestrian safety

Editor,

I'm writing to inform you that as a K-State student, I'm concerned with pedestrian safety on Claflin Road.

Several factors need to be addressed. Because of the recent end of daylight-saving time, it is getting darker sooner than it was before. People driving on Claflin are not always aware of pedestrians wanting to cross the street.

The crosswalks are not clearly visible to drivers and could cause an accident if they are not worked on soon. It is my understanding the crosswalks were constructed in 1990.

For the safety of all who have to cross that street, I'd like to see proper maintenance of these crosswalks.

Football-ticket system needs revision to ensure fairness

Editor,

During this semester, it has been obvious that K-State's football ticket system needs revision. We have come up with a few solutions.

First, the punch tickets need to be changed to six separate tickets. This is necessary because of the number of students who have lost or damaged their tickets and cannot get into games. The punch tickets are inconvenient because they cannot be laminated or refunded.

A visitor pass system should also be implemented. Any student-ticket holder without a student ID must have a pass to get into the game. To receive a pass, one must be a student who has an ID and pay the difference between regular ticket price and the student ticket price. This will cut down on the number of visiting fans in the student section.

Second, the distribution of football tickets needs to be revised. This year, thousands of students spent hours in long lines, not realizing the tickets weren't sold out. Many new and transfer students had a separate line and waited only five minutes. There was no priority system for those who had bought the dual package of football and basketball tickets, like they had previously thought.

With more than 9,000 students buying tickets, there must be some organization. We should set up a designated week and allow only those who purchased the football and basketball package to come on the first two days. This would allow them first priority for ICAT. The second two days would be for students who just purchased the football tickets, and the last two days would be for new or transfer students. Like enrollment, all students could also be allowed to come on or after their assigned days, not before.

Other Big 12 schools have implemented this kind of system with positive results. We feel these changes will provide K-State students with a more convenient football ticket system.

Lafene offers needle-free shots to help prevent winter illnesses

ANGELA BUCCIGROSSI
staff reporter

Today is the last clinic offered by Lafene Health Center for students, faculty and staff to get flu shots.

"The flu vaccine is to help people from getting influenza," Clarice Holmes, clinic coordinator, said.

The clinic is offering the flu vaccine before flu season begins to help people prevent infection.

Flu season begins in late November or early December and lasts through the winter, Holmes said.

People who get the shot now will be protected through the winter.

"The vaccine usually only lasts six to nine months and occasionally up to 12 months, but it will carry you through the flu season," she said.

Flu shots are being given from 8:30 to 11:30 a.m. and from 1:30 to 4:30 p.m. in the allergy/immunization clinic in room 121 at Lafene. The vaccine costs $6 for students and $10 for faculty and staff, and it must be paid for by cash or check.

For those who can't make it to the last flu-shot clinic, Lafene will take students on a walk-in basis.

Students who visit Lafene after today might have to wait a while, but Lafene will fit them into the schedule for the shot, Holmes said.

"They'll just have to wait and we'll try to fit them in, and we probably can," she said.

Fear of needles is one reason people don't get vaccines such as the flu shot, but Lafene has eliminated the use of needles with its new Biojector. The needle-free injection uses the force of a carbon dioxide cartridge to administer the vaccine. The cartridge produces enough air pressure to give the injection without the use of a needle.

"There is no needle and no sharp edges. It's safer for the person getting the injection and for the person giving it, because they don't have to worry about getting accidentally stuck with a dirty needle," Holmes said.

Students commonly have sore arms after the injection, she said.

Holmes said she thinks it is beneficial to get the vaccine.

"I think it's a very good thing because of the living conditions and how people are exposed to everyone in classes and in the dorms," she said.

Last year, Lafene gave 700 to 800 injections and has increased this year's order.

"We've ordered 1,000 doses. We've probably used about one-third of our vaccine already," Holmes said.

Important facts about the flu

Influenza, commonly known as the flu, is a respiratory disease caused by a virus. A highly contagious disease, it can be very serious and life-threatening to older people or the chronically ill.

How can you catch the flu?

You can catch the flu in two ways, directly and indirectly, Dr. Guy Smith, Lafene medical director, said.

"Most cases of the flu are spread by hand-to-hand contact or by kissing," he said.

You can catch the flu directly by an infected person coughing or sneezing in your direction. The flu viruses are propelled in the air, infecting others.

Indirectly, the flu can be spread onto objects such as telephones, dishes and glasses.

What are some precautions?

During the flu season, avoid large crowds. Touching your nose or eyes can infect you immediately.

"Students are somewhat more susceptible, especially if they live in the dorms. They are in a closed environment and can get exposed so much more," Smith said.

Eating a well-balanced diet, getting sleep, avoiding stress and exercising are some of the ways you can reduce your chance of getting the flu.

"Washing your hands and not partying and drinking a lot reduces your chance of exposure," Smith said. "But the most effective way is to get a vaccination."

What are the symptoms?

Some obvious symptoms are fever, chills, headaches, aching muscles and vomiting. If any of these symptoms, especially a fever of more than 101 degrees, are persistent after 48 hours, a doctor should be contacted, Smith said.

What are recommended treatments?

"The best treatment is to get sleep. You will recover sooner if you let your body rest, especially by not exercising," Smith said. If the flu becomes more serious, there is medicine that can be prescribed by a doctor.

Drinking fluids, keeping warm, taking aspirin and eating healthy will also speed up the recovery process.

SHAC examines 3 budget plans for Lafene, counseling services

JOHN HENDERSON
senior staff writer

Lafene Health Center could lose one physician if its budget isn't increased by at least 8 percent for the 1999 fiscal year.

The Student Health Advisory Committee (SHAC) heard that conclusion, presented as part of one potential budget by Lafene Director Lannie Zweimiller, at a Wednesday afternoon meeting.

Julie Tarara, doctoral student in agronomy and chair of SHAC, said Privilege Fee Committee Chair Aaron Otto had requested that SHAC present three budgets for the physical health services as well as for the counseling services.

Zweimiller's "A" budget, assumes privilege fees are increased 8 percent, no staff would be let go and all services would be offered. He said computer hardware could be upgraded for the new version of the state's accounting software.

Lafene could also spend $40,964 on disabled student services for 1999, and nearly $42,000 for 2000. Disabled Student Services hasn't been budgeted in the past two fiscal years, but it still needs funding.

Budget "B," where fees stay the same, would lead to the reduction of one physician from the staff of seven. Disabled student services couldn't be budgeted and computers couldn't be upgraded.

Budget "C," where fees would drop 5 percent, was more dismal. Two physician salaries would have to be dropped, for a loss of 350 service appointments a week, he said. By 2000, Lafene would become insolvent.

Make-A-Wish grants student's dream

NATE JENKINS
staff writer

Denise Keller was a senior in high school when she went to the hospital with a stiff neck.

Doctors noticed she had an abnormally large lymph node. Doctors thought she probably had mononucleosis, which is a serious, but normally not a life-threatening, disease.

They tested Keller for mononucleosis. The results were negative. The truth was revealed after a biopsy was done, and the Mayo Clinic had a chance to study the node.

Get involved.
Call the Make-A-Wish's Kansas headquarters to get involved. The phone number is (800) 566-9474.

She had cancer.

The diagnosis of cancer was made in September 1996, a little more than a year ago. It's impossible to tell now that the bright-eyed young woman, now a freshman at K-State and in remission from the cancer, underwent radiation and chemotherapy treatments not long ago.

"The whole thing was really scary and hard to deal with at first, but the doctors had a positive outlook because I'm a healthy person," she said.

Keller had another positive influence that helped her through the trauma. She was granted her wish to attend the Country Stampede at Tuttle Creek State Park with three of her friends and meet country-singer Kevin Sharp, thanks to the Make-A-Wish Foundation of Kansas.

The Make-A-Wish Foundation serves as an oasis for children between the ages of 2 1/2 and 18 who have life-threatening diseases, but it doesn't make any money doing it.

It is a national, nonprofit organization and has chapters throughout the world, though most of them are in the United States. Kansas was chartered in 1984 at its Wichita headquarters and granted its first wish to a sick child in 1985. Keller was the first person in Manhattan to be granted a wish by the foundation.

The idea behind the foundation is simple. Children who are deemed to have a life-threatening disease by a doctor are referred to the foundation, if the parents want to participate in the program. The children are then contacted by volunteers of the foundation, and they ask the child to think of a wish they would like to have granted.

Make-A-Wish then does everything in its power to grant the wish, at no cost to the family.

The most popular wishes are for trips to Disney World, to own a computer and meet a favorite celebrity, but Pat Greenway, the executive director of the Kansas chapter, said requests vary.

"We've had wishes from a Fisher Price toy set to a private fishing pond," Greenway said. "We take care of all the costs of the wish so that the parents don't have an economic burden. The average cost of a wish is about $4,000, and our annual budget is between $400,000 and $500,000."

The Kansas chapter has granted 319 wishes, and Greenway hopes they can do 75 this year. Besides two employees, the chapter relies on volunteers throughout the state to help make wishes come true. Volunteers also raise money for the foundation and act as spokespeople.

Money donated or raised in Kansas for Make-A-Wish is only used to grant wishes for Kansas children, and qualifying to be a volunteer for the foundation only requires going to one training session.

Greenway prefers to look past all the logistics and concentrates on the importance of the service.

"The wishes aren't about money. They are about offering a bright spot in what has normally been a very bleak life," she said.

POWERBALL

Lottery officials mix things up with jackpots, playing changes

STORIES BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

The changes in Powerball.

- Players used to choose five white balls from a pool of 45 and a red ball from a pool of 45. Now there will be 49 white balls and 42 red balls.
- The odds of winning the jackpot by matching all five white balls and the red Powerball used to be one in 54.9 million. Now they're one in 80.1 million.
- Players can choose between getting all their money, after taxes, spread over 25 years or in one check. The lump-sum payment would come out to about half the jackpot.
- The Powerball is now $3, up from $1.
- The Powerball and a white ball, now $4, up from $2.
- The Powerball and two white balls, now $7, up from $5.
- The Powerball and three white balls or four white balls, still $100.
- The Powerball and four white balls, still $5,000.
- Five white balls, no Powerball, still $100,000.

DES MOINES, Iowa — Powerball jackpots will be bigger and the odds longer as lottery officials try to revive players suffering from jackpot fatigue with changes that took effect with Wednesday's drawing.

So far, though, lottery officials in the multistate game said players are more interested in the big money than in their slim chance of winning it.

"You tell people about the odds and they say, 'You know, it's a long shot anyway. It doesn't really make any difference. If I'm going to win it, I'm going to win it. If it's my turn, I'm going to get it,'" Jim Maguire, director of Indiana's Hoosier Lottery, said.

Players are still trying to match five white balls and a red Powerball. But now they have 49 white balls and 42 red balls to choose from. Both pools used to have 45 balls. The price of a ticket, $1, remains the same.

Because there was a winner Saturday, Wednesday's jackpot dropped back to square one, which is now $10 million rather than $5 million.

Libby White, a spokeswoman with the West Virginia Lottery, said the bigger jackpots were a hit with test groups called in to talk about the changes.

She said the groups were told that the odds of winning the game were worse: 1 in 80.1 million, up from 1 in 54.9 million.

"They didn't applaud, but at the same time, from what I could see, they didn't seem to be bothered about it," White said. "It wasn't negative, it was more, 'Tell us more about the jackpots.'"

And while the odds of winning the big jackpot are getting worse, those of winning a smaller prize are getting better because there is a better chance of matching the Powerball.

Now if a player picks only the Powerball, the ticket is worth $3. Previously, players would only get back the cost of the $1 ticket. Prizes for matching the Powerball and other white numbers also are bigger.

"The odds at the very high end are offset by the improved odds of winning a lower-end prize," said David M. Miller, chief executive of the New Mexico Lottery. "If I put in $1 and I get a couple of dollars back, I'm not unhappy."

REVENUE

The suggestions include asking the state of Kansas for a portion of Kansas Lottery proceeds, a $1 stipend on Alumni Association membership fees, 10 percent of licensing revenues and help from the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

Sue Peterson, assistant to the president for government relations, said the library would compete with numerous other state projects for a portion of lottery funds.

> We're for everybody, but folks need to understand that we're not the big money-producing conglomerate that some perceive us to be.
>
> Bob Cavello
> athletic department business manager

"The lottery and gambling proceeds go into a special fund, and then those are put into the Economic Development Initiative Fund," Peterson said.

"I think you could make the case for the library, but there are lots of other things that compete against it. It's sort of the extra money that the Legislature can put on special projects that it chooses to fund," she said.

Another recommendation, using a portion of Alumni Association dues, hasn't been discussed, the association president said.

"At this point and time, no one has approached us about the association providing an alternate source of funding," Alumni Association President Amy Button-Renz said. "I am aware that we are mentioned in the report, but we haven't visited with anyone about it yet."

Renz said 14,882 members pay dues on an annual basis, while the rest of the 35,000 members are paying or have paid for a lifetime membership.

She said more research will determine if the $1 per member donation would be possible.

"We would need to research it and look at the impact it would have on our current budget," she said.

Licensing revenues, generated from K-State's registered Powercat logo, were also mentioned in the task-force report.

John Fairman, assistant vice president for institutional advancement and director of licensing, said that money is used for student scholarships.

A policy change would be necessary to put some of the licensing funds toward library initiatives, he said.

"The library wouldn't be scholarships, and that's the area that, in our records, the money is supposed to be used for. There would have to be a change there," he said. "Then it's like, 'Do you take the scholarships from the students?'"

But Provost Jim Coffman said increases in licensing revenue, which continues to grow, could be earmarked for the library fund.

"If the licensing sales continue to go up, and you take out an amount that is smaller than the increase in total sales, then scholarships are still going up but some of the increase would go to the library.

The report also lists the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics as a possible source of funding, citing schools like the University of Nebraska, which gave $480,000 to its library to prevent journal cuts.

Athletic Department Business Manager Bob Cavello said a gift from the department wouldn't be possible.

"Each of the programs (listed by the task force) has in excess of $20 million for an athletic budget. Nebraska has $30 million. We barely have $14 million," Cavello said.

Surplus funds are few, he said, and are used to fund Title IX compliance for women's athletics.

Cavello said the department will support the library in whatever way it can, though.

"We're for everybody," he said, "but folks need to understand that we're not the big money-producing conglomerate that some perceive us to be."

Another funding possibility, said President Jon Wefald, is a new university beverage contract with a prominent soft-drink company.

Wefald said a new contract agreement could be reached within the next nine months, and some proceeds from that relationship could benefit the library.

McCahon said she knows that not all of the task force's ideas will come to pass, but they can be used to get everyone thinking, she said.

"We provided these as a springboard for further types of creative ideas, basically to get the whole university thinking about what we could possibly do to further support the library," McCahon said.

REPORT

absolutely necessary.

"If we were to just rely on state and foundation funds, we would be covering the long-term needs," she said. "But the student fee gives us the opportunity to enhance the heck out of our library."

McCahon said student input will be crucial before a fee is proposed.

"It's not the end of the line," she said of the $2 fee proposal. "It's an important piece of the package that we're recommending, but there's always room for flexibility.

"We want to develop a dialogue with students, student senators and student administration to see what makes sense and what the students want for the library, too."

STATE FUNDS

A key component of the task-force proposal is an increase in OOE funds from the state of Kansas. The recommendations also suggest the library OOE fund be separated from the general fund and be increased by 8 percent annually.

Sue Peterson, assistant to the president for government relations, said a change in OOE would have to be approved by the Kansas Board of Regents.

"We would have to work with the Board of Regents to have that as a special category. They set the parameters and give us the guidelines for us to submit our budget and they approve those," Peterson said.

State funds at the recommended increase would provide about $300,000 for 1998-99, according to the report. The number would continue to grow by $24,000 to $30,000 for the next four years.

Peterson said an increase in state funds and especially the change in OOE classifications would be a long process. Still, she said, anything is possible.

"You can ask for anything," Peterson said. "Realistically, the process is established, and it's pretty much tightly controlled by the regents, and we work with them on it. It needs to kind of go through those hoops."

Whatever the university asks for, Peterson said state funding should be a part of the solution to Hale's dilemma.

"The state built part of the building. That's their function, but their function is also to help support it on the inside," she said.

KSU FOUNDATION ENDOWMENT

The third of three long-term funding recommendations in the task-force proposal is the creation of a $10 million Foundation endowment account. The task force lists the endowment as a source of $500,000 per year for the library, beginning in 1998-99.

That's news to Gary Hellebust, president and CEO of the Foundation.

"I've not had any contact from them," he said.

Hellebust had received a copy of the report, but wasn't consulted when the document was written, he said.

Hale Library is ranked high on a list of 32 fund-raising priorities, Hellebust said, but other factors will have to be considered. The feasibility of a $10 million drive has yet to be determined, he said.

"I have no quabble with the $10 million figure," he said. "I think if that's what they need that's what they start with, but then you begin a case and feasibility study to determine if that's possible. You can have all the good intentior in the world, but if you don't have a cor stituency to support it, you'll come u short."

LABS

enrolled in math classes seem to use the lab most.

But the lab hasn't seen any new computer units since the lab's construction seven years ago, Bennett said.

The only upgrades have been a switch from 386 processors to 486 processors.

"Before, with the 386s, there was some software we couldn't run," Bennett said. "Now we can run the software, but it runs slowly."

Bennett said the lab's yearly maintenance budget is $8,000, giving the lab a replacement time of once every 10 years.

"That's nowhere near acceptable with today's changing technology," he said.

Bennett said replacing the computers once in five years would be a more standard time frame.

"We're basically a generation and a half behind in computers," he said. "We can't even afford to add more classes because the lab is to capacity already."

Bennett said if he had to grade the math department's lab compared with math department labs at other schools on a scale of A through F, he would grade it a C minus and falling, at best.

James Legg, head of the Department of Physics, said he thought space was the biggest problem with the lab.

"There are things we can't do in the lab," Legg said. "We'd like to have another interactive lab somewhere, but there's always the problem of space. Every inch of real estate becomes contested with multiple people wanting to use it."

Differences in the quality and quantity of equipment in the labs can be seen as a result of each department's resources.

Simon said the upgrades within the journalism school are being done with endowments received by the school. Other labs rely on money allocated to them from either the department, the College of Arts and Sciences, the university, private industry or a combination of them all.

Peter Nicholls, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, said departments are given money for lab upgrades based on priority and educational importance.

"Of course we can't give everyone what they want," Nicholls said. "We couldn't afford it, so we must prioritize. By prioritizing, we look at how essential each lab is. They have to make a case, present their case with statistics and facts that show it is needed and is of educational importance."

Nicholls said the pressure of student numbers within a department might also influence the arts and sciences college when deciding which departments will receive funding for computer lab upgrades.

"Labs that will potentially be used by hundreds of students get priority over one used by, say, a dozen students," Nicholls said.

Departments have the option to help fund upgrades through user fees.

Students who use the Kedzie labs are required to pay a $25 user fee at the beginning of the semester to cover costs of maintenance such as paper and ink for the printers.

The math and physics lab doesn't charge a student fee, but Bennett said he thought it was a reasonable way to get support for the labs. However, Bennett said passing a proposal for a user fee would be difficult.

"The engineering school passed a student user fee a couple years back, and they had a hard time doing that," Bennett said. "I think the word right now is not to muddy the waters. We don't want to push a fee on everyone right away."

The English lab does not charge students for the use of its labs.

Stroupe said he didn't think it was necessary to charge students, because the lab functions well now for what it is supposed to do, which is word processing.

Departments that want to upgrade but face a lack of funds are either working to get funds or are finding alternate ways to deal with the problem.

"We're working with administrators to bring in more computers," Ward said of the English department lab. "We're at the talking stages where we're deciding what we need and where we'll get the money."

Bennett said the math department has tried both independently and with the physics department to get a second lab with multimedia capacity.

"Also, we want to move material to the Web so students can access it through other labs," Bennett said. "Until we can get more space in our own lab, that's the path the department is heading down."

Bennett said he questions the importance of computer labs, however, in comparison with other university issues.

"While the labs need money, I'm not sure how that ranks with the need for money for academic journals and the faculty shortage we're facing."

ROTC
Cadets split into 2 companies to improve training

ZACH VADER
staff reporter

K-State's ROTC made a huge change Wednesday afternoon in efforts to improve the training of the younger cadets, as well as juniors and seniors.

ROTC split into two companies. It used to be four. Each class was identified in a range from MS1 (freshman) to MS4 (seniors).

Ryan Strong, captain, said ROTC made this change because seniors were usually the ones in charge of training the younger cadets. Now, the younger cadets will be teaching as well, with a more interactive feel to the situation.

"The officers have been altered to improve communication," Strong said. "Now the younger cadets will have a little more security, because the officers won't be changing every week like in the past."

Strong also pointed out this new method is structured so the cadets will interact with more than just a few people.

Doug Thomas, cadet captain, said he likes the new method and thinks it will accomplish positive goals.

"We want to make this more like the real army," Thomas said. "I think it will develop a stronger sense of leadership and other important skills into the younger cadets."

Thomas also pointed out there would be more interaction between the companies and integration is the key.

"Responsibility is another key factor," Thomas said. "The younger cadets will be asked to handle a lot more sooner, which will be a benefit for everyone."

Thomas said he knows this transition will not be easy.

"We are going to run a pilot program of the new system for the remainder of the semester," he said. "We will try to work out all of the kinks and start it off full steam next semester."

Mike Gast, cadet, said he thinks it will be, a positive change.

"Its a great change," Gast said. "It will provide more consistency, a better chance to learn and there won't be a new person in charge every single week like in the past."

Worship, fellowship goals of group

LORI GUILFOYLE
staff reporter

To encourage, challenge and provide opportunities for students to grow in their relationships with God is the overall objective of BSU-Christian Challenge.

"Its main purpose is to help people get to know Jesus," Todd Stewart, K-State alumnus and full-time staff member, said.

Although BSU stands for Baptist Student Union, it is not associated with any specific religious denomination.

By avoiding specific denominations, the main focus of Christian Challenge is placed on Jesus Christ, not whether a person is Baptist, Methodist or Catholic, Mike Little, senior in finance, said.

"It is a great place to come and worship God and to get yourself back on track," Little said.

Bob Anderson, director of BSU-Christian Challenge for the past 26 years, said Christian Challenge was added to the name so it could reach out to everyone.

"It is easier for people to recognize who we are," he said. "Building relationships with God and with others is not exclusive, it is open to everyone."

As director, plans meetings, coordinates retreats, conventions and mission projects, and maintains extensive alumni relations. Additionally, he talks individually to students, provides premarriage counseling and performs weddings.

He said sometimes people get BSU-Christian Challenge confused as a church, even though it is just a campus group.

Meetings are from 7 to 8:30 p.m. every Thursday in the Union Little Theatre. About 200 to 250 people attend the meetings, which involve worship and a speaker.

Each meeting begins with the Christian Challenge Worship Team, an eight-member live band with drums, guitars, a keyboard and vocalists. A projector supplies words to the songs on a large screen so everyone can participate in singing. The songs begin at fast pace then move toward slower, more meaningful songs to prepare everyone for worship, Little said.

The Worship Team is followed by a speaker that provides practical topics relating to students. Some of the past topics include friendships, what it means to be forgiven and relationships with God and others, Anderson said.

Stewart compared the topics to an informal and personal church sermon.

"We dig into what the Bible says and apply it to our own lives and help students apply it to their lives," he said.

In addition to the Thursday night rally, 25 small groups led by staff and students meet each week for Bible study. Anderson said this allows students to enjoy friends and to share God in their own lives.

Opportunities for members to build lasting friendships are also provided through retreats, conferences, parties and dances put on by the organization.

Little said the attendance has increased since he first attended a meeting as a freshman in fall 1994. There were usually 75 people at every meeting, he said. He attributes the increased attendance to publicity by word of mouth. He also said he believes a lot of people are undercover Christians. More and more, people are stepping out with their faith.

"It's a movement of God," Stewart said. "God is giving people the desire to know him."

Stewart, who has not always been Christian, said he became involved when he moved to Manhattan four years ago and his roommate was involved in Christian Challenge.

"There was something incredibly different about the group," he said.

When he graduated in December 1996, he became a full-time staff member.

"It is exciting and truly rewarding when someone gets to the point of surrendering their life and embracing Jesus," Stewart said. "It is only through him that things are possible."

For Little, BSU-Christian Challenge is the difference between an escape and a refuge. By Thursday, he said, most people see the bars as an escape from the stress endured during the week.

"With Christian Challenge, a person can step away to get refueled, not escape. It builds you up to join the real world again," Little said.

A person can grow as a Christian by spending time with God on a daily basis, attending the Thursday Christian Challenge meeting and through Bible studies, he said.

"All of these things build on each other to help you grow as a Christian. None of these things help if it is only part time. If you are seeking Christ and want to grow, you have to make it a priority," Little said. "It boils down to your own perspective. It has to be an eternal vs. part-time commitment."

Sunflower Showdown simmers for Wildcats

Cats drive for 5th-consecutive victory over rival Jayhawks

SUN DEE MILLS
sports editor

As K-State began its climb into the football history books, defensive end Dirk Ochs was a freshman in 1992. His brother Travis, junior Wildcat linebacker, remembered that back then it wasn't cool to be a Cat.

"When Dirk decided to come here, most of the people from my area didn't think very highly of it," the younger Ochs said.

The Ochs brothers are from Overland Park, Kan., the heart of Kansas Jayhawk country.

"When Dirk started here, my mom would take us shopping and we'd see more Nebraska, Colorado and KU stuff," Ochs said. "K-State stuff was hard to find."

The same feeling surrounded Wichita, home of Wildcat place kicker Jamie Rheem.

"Society was leaning towards KU, the same with my parents," Rheem said. "I knew all the coaches and had taken recruiting visits up there."

But the Cats' successes made Rheem satisfied with his decision.

"I liked K-State's coaches and facilities better," Rheem said. "I made a good choice."

Rheem, along with his teammates, haven't experienced a time the Cats didn't dominate this rivalry. After beating the Hawks the past four years in the Sunflower Showdown, the game has taken on less urgency for the Cats.

The Hawks, however, need to win this game or next week's game against Texas to qualify for a bowl game. Ochs said he was sure if the Hawks could choose a win, it'd be over the Cats.

"They'd much rather be us," Ochs said. "They could kill two birds with one stone. They will try to make it a bad day for us."

Offensively, that will be a challenge for the No. 112-ranked Kansas offense vs. the Cats' defense, ranked No. 5 in the country. The Hawks' career-rushing leader June Henley and go-to receiver Isaac Byrd graduated, and quarterback Zac Wegner has never seen action against the Cats.

The Hawks' original starting quarterback, Matt Johner, missed three games because of a broken finger suffered in the Oklahoma game Oct. 4. Johner and running back Eric Vann are the Hawks' lone seniors on offense. Vann is 37th on the KU scoring list with 1,347 career yards and leads the Hawks with five touchdowns this season.

"Eric Vann is a very impressive running back who's running the ball well right now," Coach Bill Snyder said. "We tried to recruit Eric out of high school. He's managed good numbers."

Overall, Snyder didn't think KU had the most ineffective offense in the country. It wouldn't have five wins if it did, he said. Snyder also said it was unfair to judge the team solely on the low ranking.

"The fact is that they have made a steady improvement," Snyder said. "People have been critical of their offense, but that's a new system, and it is more complex to draw together than defensive schemes would be."

The Hawks' defense is a different story. On the season, the defense has 27 quarterback sacks for minus 183 yards, 10 more than the Hawks recorded during the entire 1996 season. Outside linebacker Ron Warner has 12.5 of those sacks alone and leads the country in sacks. Overall, Warner has 17.5 tackles for minus 119 yards.

Snyder said the Hawks' experience in this area contributes to their success.

"Defensively, they return seven or eight guys who were starters last year," Snyder said. "That doesn't include certainly one of the best pass rushers in the conference. They've got good personnel."

The Hawk defense has also scored four of the team's 15 touchdowns, three on interceptions and one fumble return.

Special teams-wise, Hawk defensive back Jason Harris has blocked three punts in the past two games, two of which were returned for touchdowns. True freshman kicker Joe Garcia is nine-of-11 on field goal attempts.

But Snyder was pleased with his special-teamers' performance against Texas Tech, calling punter James Garcia's kicking performance crucial to the game's outcome.

"We've got good specialists, and when they perform well, they are very, very capable," Snyder said. "The kicking game and forcing Texas Tech into poor field position was as important as our defense."

On all sides of the ball, Snyder said the showdown means a lot to the Kansas native players, but for more reasons than the intrastate rivalry.

"KU is playing for the opportunity to be involved in a bowl game," Snyder said. "We're playing for some opportunities within the bowl system, ourselves. This means a lot to our players."

Visions of bowl games have the Hawks talking. Cat junior long snapper Brandon Knowles went to El Dorado High School with Vann and said he talked to his former teammate Monday about the upcoming matchup.

"They're going to come in here with the attitude that they need one more game for a bowl," Knowles said. "It's got to be either us or Texas, and they want to get that win."

Although sophomore linebacker Mark Simoneau didn't go to high school with any Hawks, he said the history of the rivalry makes the game more intense.

"Knowing they're an hour away from us, it's important to the Kansas guys like me," Simoneau, from Smith Center, Kan., said. "It's fun to play a game like that."

Knowles said the intrastate bragging rights over former teammates were the highlight of a victory.

"It's a big game regardless," Knowles said, "but I'd be lying if I didn't say it wasn't more to play against guys I played in high school."

KRIS EMMONS/Collegian

KU/K-State game irrelevant in grand scheme of things

VIEWPOINT
KRISTIE BLASI

KRISTIE BLASI is a senior from Caney, Kan., and is the University Daily Kansan sports editor. You can send your e-mail comments to Kristie at kblasi@kansan.com

I'm not going to ridicule K-State, the education it provides or the demographic consistency of its student body.

I (unfortunately) pay taxes and actually care about the quality of education the state institutions provide. I know and am related to a lot of people at the other school. And I'm certain the student bodies are more similar than either would like to admit.

And the game doesn't matter anyway.

Oh, it has mattered when, after defeats in football the past four years, I have returned to southeast Kansas or have seen my two brothers who attended K-State.

For the past four years, I have logically replied to insults and the like:

1. K-State is not Kansas' biggest rival. My training to be a Kansas Student Ambassador taught me this. The correct answer is Missouri. Unfortunately, I think this only applies to people who remember when the Mizzou rivalry was bigger or to people who are from the greater Kansas City area. Color the rest of the state purple or crimson and blue, but don't mix the colors.

2. Wait until basketball. For your information, the dates are Jan. 17 and Feb. 14 this season. But Wildcat fans seem to believe that one win on the turf is more important than two on the court.

3. Purple is ugly. It's just a color preference. Really.

4. At least our school song does not resemble "I've Been Working on the Railroad." What is that, and must the K-State Marching Band play it all the time? There should be laws.

5. The Jayhawk might be a mythical mascot, but that Powercat is a nonexistent graphic. That doesn't look like a cat any more than Willie does.

It is hoped that this is not a preview for my trips home for the holidays. But the insults won't hurt my feelings, and my logic remains intact.

The game hasn't been played yet, but both Division I, football-playing universities in Kansas already have lost.

Both schools are losers when a sold-out game featuring a certain bowl team and a possible bowl team are relegated to pay-per-view by television officials in charge of the Big 12 Conference contract. Not only does the snub limit fan access to the game, but it damages recruiting for both schools when they try to compete in the Big 12 region.

A big reason for the lack of respect is lack of schedule strength. K-State played and defeated Northern Illinois, Ohio and Bowling Green in its non-conference schedule this season.

And three directional schools — Western Michigan, Northern Illinois and Northeast Louisiana — are set to collect the gate receipts, get knocked off by a supposed football powerhouse and go back to their Mid-American, Midwestern Collegiate and Southland conference races.

Two of Kansas' three non-conference foes hail from conferences who at least have guaranteed slots in bowl games. And Jayhawk schedule-makers have dared to schedule a Big 10 team (gasp) in consecutive years during my college career and even agreed to meet Florida State this decade. They lost the game, but the Seminole shutout landed Jayhawks on national television wearing uniforms other than shorts and tank tops.

Now, neither football team can get on regional television with regularity unless Nebraska is the opponent.

Schedule strength is an important factor in football reputation. But football in the state of Kansas has a lot to overcome.

The defining moment in Kansas vs. K-State football was in 1987. A glory year for either program it was not. I was watching football on a Saturday afternoon with my dad and three brothers when ABC's John Saunders informed his national audience that Kansas and K-State had tied 17-17 in the "Battle of the Bads."

He said that on national television. And he was right. The Jayhawks finished the season 1-9-1 and the Wildcats were a winless 0-10-1. Unfortunately, a lot of folks think he still is right.

It takes a long time for people to forget that the two programs were so pathetic not so long ago.

But I guess the Wildcats, bound for another Cotton Bowl, will play host to the Holiday Bowl-bound Jayhawks on Saturday anyway.

Kansas 10, K-State 7 in overtime.

I can't wait for holiday vacations.

Ex-Jayhawker views KU/K-State contest as no contest at all

I want to tell you a little secret: I used to be a Jayhawk. Now, you can stop writing the angry letters. I realized the error of my ways, didn't I?

Some of you might call me a turncoat. I call it a wise career and social move.

For reasons not pertinent to this column, I left KU to pursue other interests. When I returned to college, I chose K-State because I had a sister here, and I knew no one in Lawrence. My sister said, "You'll love it here. I promise."

She was right. After two years at the school on top of Mount Oread, I never found a comfortable niche. If I had, I wouldn't be writing this column.

Within a week in Wildcat Country, I found that niche, along with three other ex-Jayhawks who'd had the same problem. I am thankful I made that decision, because I have received opportunities here I never would have seen at KU.

Opportunities like experiencing true football fans. In the infamous words of Coach Bill Snyder, "No other school can say they brought 45,000 fans across the state line to watch a football game." And despite the heartbreaking Cotton Bowl loss, the fans are still there, as classy as ever.

I got the opportunity to see a team compete in its first New Year's Day bowl game. I can't predict how long modern-day KU football fans (if there are any) will have to wait for that to happen.

And I got to experience a roll-up-your-sleeves, smash-mouth type of football that's played the same way every year. Regardless of the players on the field, Wildcat coaches instill the same methods in each player in uniform — just get the job done.

This year's Wildcat team is doing that — and then some. Snyder said in Tuesday's news conference that matchups would be key for this game. After looking at the numbers, there is no comparison. The Cats top every category.

OFFENSIVE LINE: Piece of cake. The Hawks have switched around players in their positions so much on the O-line, reading the depth charts must be a dizzying experience for them.

Justin Glasgow and Jerome Parks have reversed tackle and guard duties. Parks has taken a back seat to Michael Lies at right tackle on the two-deep, and Lies is one of three walk-ons on the Hawks' O-line. Just three games ago, Dan Dercher was moved from defensive end to left tackle.

And the Cats? Behind the biggest offensive line in school history, the Cat running game is set to break school rushing records this season. EDGE: CATS

QUARTERBACK: With Cat quarterback Michael Bishop ranking fourth in the Big 12 in passing efficiency and sixth in total offense, this contest is no contest. Bishop is 54-130-6 for 1,051 yards passing and has 391 rushing yards under his belt.

No. 2 Jonathan Beasley did a great job coming off the bench when Bishop was lagging Saturday in Lubbock, Texas, scoring a touchdown in the process.

Hawk starting play-caller Matt Johner broke a finger Oct. 4 and saw his first action since then last Saturday. Hawk sophomore backup Zac Wegner will see his fifth start this Saturday and has 44 completions on 94 passing attempts for 576 yards this season. Yawn. EDGE: CATS

RECEIVERS: Once a weakness for the Cats, the receivers have stepped up when necessary. Bishop's increased passing game has brought about the skills of receivers Darnell McDonald and Gavin Peries and tight end Justin Swift.

The Hawks' Michael Chandler has the most receptions, with 17 grabs (less than two a game) for 260 yards. He is followed by Eric Vann, a running back, hmm. EDGE: CATS

RUNNING BACKS: Vann will need to be contained, no question. Against Oklahoma, Vann posted a 99-yard touchdown run, the fifth player in NCAA history to do so. Vann ranks 11th in the Big 12 in rushing, but guess who's right above him? Cat back Eric Hickson. Mike Lawrence was on fire against Texas A&M, and don't forget Bishop's penchant for scrambling. EDGE: CATS

DEFENSIVE LINE/LBS: In this category, the Hawks are strong. With experience on their side, the Hawks have recorded 27 sacks so far, with linebacker Ron Warner responsible for 12.5 of them.

The Hawks are sixth in the Big 12, giving up 337 yards per game. Still, the Cats are second in the Big 12 and fifth in the nation. 'Nuff said. EDGE: CATS

Cats sneak by Hawks in 5-game matchup

DAN MERKER
assistant sports editor

Wednesday night was like a Hitchcock movie for the K-State volleyball team.

The birds just wouldn't go away. They kept attacking, and the problem just grew.

Unlike in Hitchcock's classic movie "The Birds," the Wildcats did manage to survive the attack, in a close 3-2 victory over the Kansas Jayhawks in front of 2,992 fans at Ahearn Field House.

It was a bittersweet night for the Cats. K-State was without middle blocker Val Wieck for the second-consecutive match. She left the team when it was in Texas to be with her ill mother. It was learned Wednesday that Wieck's mother died. There was no word on when she will return. Heather Haff started in her place for the second-consecutive match.

Even though KU came into the match with only one conference win, the Cats knew they'd have to play well to win.

"They're 1-11 in the Big 12," middle blocker Kelle Branting said. "What do they have to lose? It's a big rivalry, and they're playing on emotion."

The Cats started off the match looking like they were playing a team with only one conference win. K-State had six points before the Hawks managed to score, and won the game handily, by a 15-3 score.

The Cats dominated in virtually every phase of the game. They made only two hitting errors, and had an attack percentage of .375. Their defense was also stellar. Although the Cats had only two blocks, they kept KU to a negative .063 attack percentage.

K-State used the momentum it had in game one to start off the second game strongly. The Cats jumped out to a 3-0 lead before Kansas had a side-out, but the Jayhawks battled back. They would get nine out of the next 10 points to lead 9-4.

Then K-State went on a run. It scored four consecutive points on setter Devon Ryning's serve, and fought back to lead 13-11. KU then got the next three points to serve for the game, but K-State answered to tie the match at 14 and again at 15. The Hawks managed to take the game 17-15 on two straight points on setter Laura Rhode's serve.

"We kind of let down a little bit, and they certainly turned it up a notch," Branting said. "There were times we didn't cover our hitters as well as we should have

Women's golf wraps up season

SPORTS INFORMATION

The K-State women's golf team ended its fall season Tuesday with a 12th-place finish (324-311-310=945) at the Diet Coke-Roadrunner Invitational in Las Cruces, N.M. The Wildcats were led by junior Jane Yi, who moved up three spots to tie for 15th place (76-76-75=227) in the individual competition.

New Mexico State won the three-day tournament with a team total 894. The individual competition was won by New Mexico State's A.J. Eathorne, who finished the tournament at 2-under-par and a total of 214.

Other Cat finishers included Edie Murdoch (T-36), Carrie Chambers (T-55), Mitzi Taylor (73) and Ann Slater (T-84).

The Cats finished their five-tournament season at the par-72 University Golf Course and will resume tournament play in the spring.

(defensively), and that really hurt us."

The second game was a defensive battle. K-State had seven blocks to KU's six, and while the Hawks hit a paltry .080, they kept the Cats to negative .019. That sent the teams into the locker rooms tied at one game apiece.

The Cats came out of the locker room hot in game three. They jumped out to an 8-2 lead and coasted from there to take the game 15-7. K-State recovered from game two's low attack percentage to hit .341 in the third. The Cats were one tantalizing game from their sixth straight decision over the Jayhawks.

The Hawks took the first three points of game four, but the Cats responded with two points to pull within one. They never got any closer than that, as the Jayhawks pulled ahead and cruised to a 15-9 fourth-game victory to force a fifth game.

"I don't think I thought we'd go five games with them, but I definitely knew they'd come out ready to play and that they really wanted to beat us, but we wanted to beat them right back," Haff said.

Game five, played under the rally-scoring system where a team doesn't have to be serving to score a point, went down to the wire. KU started out leading 4-3, but that was the last time it would lead the deciding game. K-State scored the next four points on swing hitter Kim Zschau's serve. The teams went back and forth from there, with the Cats never leading by more than three.

K-State had match point at 14-11 after a delicate tip by right-side hitter Alexis Shepherd. The Jayhawks got the next two points to pull within one, but KU middle blocker Amanda Reves hit a serve long to give the Cats the final point of the match and their first five-game win of the season.

K-State ended up the match hitting .182 to .136 for KU. Branting led K-State attackers, hitting .450 and making only two hitting errors. Four Wildcats had more than 10 digs, and Ryning again led the team with 56 assists.

The Cats will take on Oklahoma at 7 p.m. Friday in Ahearn Field House. When the Cats visited the Sooners in Norman, Oklahoma handed K-State a 3-2 loss. Since that match, though, the Cats have won nine of 10.

SECONDARY: The Hawks boast being second in the Big 12 in pass defense, only giving up six touchdowns through the air this year.

And the Cats? No. 1 in the Big 12, No. 6 in the nation; the Cats have given up no aerial touchdowns in the past 30 quarters. EDGE: CATS

SPECIAL TEAMS: Cat punter James Garcia, the No. 12 punter in the nation, booted a 76-yarder vs. Mizzou. Garcia averages 44.89 yards on 35 punts (and he'll still have only 35 punts after the game Saturday). Punt returners Lamar Chapman and David Allen rank nationally in return yardage. Martin Gramatica's 14-of-15-field-goals, No. 4-in-the-nation status speaks for itself.

For the Hawks, Big 12 No. 2 kickoff returner David Winbush is questionable this weekend due to an ankle sprain. Hawk punter Dean Royal has had almost twice as much punting practice as Garcia, averaging 44.41 yards on 64 attempts. EDGE: CATS

Now, KU fans will retaliate. They will say I left KU because I was flunking out and K-State was the only school that would take me. Only I (and the registrar's office) know that's not true. They will say our mothers only have three teeth and we ride tractors to class. Only we know that's not true. You won't hear them saying anything about football, the subject at hand. And that's because they have nothing to say.

Willie

Biggest fan at K-State also best-kept secret

CAREY KIPER
staff reporter

AUTHOR'S NOTE: *Name has been changed to protect anonymity.

KSU Stadium erupts as the Wildcats score another touchdown against Missouri. The score is now 41-3, and the crowd goes wild. As the announcer confirms the seven points, 43,510 sets of eyes turn down the field as the cheerleaders emerge holding a long, wooden board. One figure jumps on and begins the first of 41 push-ups as the stadium counts with him. Not even winded, Willie the Wildcat finishes the touchdown ritual by leading the crowd in a thundering "K-S-U Wildcats!"

More watched than the football team, more sought-after than the cheerleaders and more visible everywhere he goes, Willie is the personification of K-State pride, a heralded icon for 25 years. Every week, football fans flock to the games not only to watch the teams, but also to smile and laugh at Willie.

What many people forget is the person underneath the big head and double-zero football jersey. An average college student, Willie is one of medium height and build, nothing setting him apart from the others, unless one happens to look closely at the mischievous smile and laughing eyes.

Brian* has had this alter ego for three years. He alternates between referring to himself as Willie and to Willie as a separate entity. But once Brian starts talking, you can easily imagine him leading thousands of fans in a cheer or calming down a frightened baby.

Friendly, yet on the quiet side, Brian said Willie has helped him overcome some of his shyness.

"I've always been weird with my friends," Brian said, "but I was quiet in front of people I didn't know. Now, though, I'm not as shy as I used to be. Willie is still timid out there sometimes, though."

Brian said balancing school and Willie is a difficult task.

"I made it to two classes in the first two weeks of school. I had to explain to my teachers, after some of them dropped me, who I was and why I kept missing these assignments."

Brian's normal weekday consists of rising at about 8 a.m., going to work, going to class during the afternoon and then going to practice until around 10 p.m. Even the weekends do not mean time off for him, because he attends all football games.

"I didn't have to work this past Sunday," he said, "so I had a lot of fun that night, knowing I didn't have to get up. I was still up by 10 a.m. because I'm used to functioning on five hours of sleep a night."

A typical game day begins at 8 a.m. for Brian, making appearances around Manhattan, getting his picture taken and preparing for the pre-kick-off skit at 1 p.m. By game time, Willie has been going for five hours "and the crowd wonders why I go out there having to do 300 push-ups and die when I get there," Brian said. Yet he said that is still his favorite part of the job.

"I like proving to everybody who thinks that I'm not going to be able to make it after scoring all those points that I can. I just like being a ham," he said.

JEFF COOPER/Collegian

WILLIE THE WILDCAT signs autographs for young K-State fans. His other duties include doing the appropriate number of pushups after the Wildcats score points during football games and leading cheers.

This tradition of hamming it up as Willie is evident in the decor of Brian's apartment. A Wildcat floor mat greets you at the door, and a Willie banner is high on the wall overlooking Brian's spotless apartment, where he has spent almost no time in the past three years.

After two years of community college, Brian transferred to K-State and saw an advertisement in the Collegian for tryouts.

"I don't know why I did it," Brian said. "I just felt like I needed to get involved. It was either that or Glee Club, and I can't sing, so here I am."

The "gig," as Brian calls it, calls for two Willies. The junior varsity Willie makes appearances at volleyball and women's basketball, and varsity Willie does football and men's basketball. This is Brian's first year as varsity Willie, but he made a few appearances the past two years in the other Willie's place.

"My first year we had tryouts on a Wednesday. I found out that I made it that night, and they also told me I had to be Willie at the game on Saturday because the other guy couldn't make it," Brian said. "It was like, 'Congratulations, you're Willie. Get a skit ready for Saturday.' I had no idea what to do.

"I'd only been to one K-State home game, and didn't even know what he did. So to come out there and see the stadium full … I don't even remember it, my heart was beating so fast."

Brian also substituted for varsity Willie twice his second year for the pre-kickoff skit. When the other Willie got too tired after a high-scoring game to do his push-ups, the two changed places in the middle of the game.

"I tried to go slow (doing the push-ups) because he died, but because Willie doesn't have a full costume, people could tell by the legs," he said. "Even the announcers way up in the booth commented about the change. They said that they thought it was against NCAA regulations to change mascots in the middle of the game. The crowd must have thought I'd taken a quick shot of Gatorade or something."

The personality and energy level go hand-in-hand for the role of Willie, Brian said.

"I'm a screwball and everybody knows it. At first it was hard because your friends are out there and you don't want to be weird in front of your friends, so it's better if nobody knows.

"After three years, though, a lot of people know, more than I prefer, but I don't mind anymore. I'll go out in front of 40,000 people in a tutu. It doesn't bother me a bit," Brian said. "It is weird how people will nit-pick and try to figure out who Willie is, though."

After tutoring at an elementary school last year, Brian said the children figured out who he was, and he finally had to impress upon them the importance of keeping it a secret.

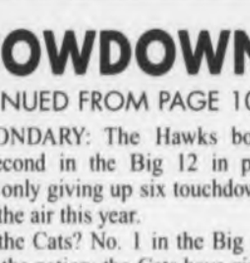
"When you appear so much, sometimes people just figure it out," he said.

Cheerleading coach Steve Kirkland is Brian's secretary for appearances. Willie must get certain things approved by the athletic directors for the skits, but he is on his own for the most part. Timing and music are coordinated down to the second, however, because of the JumboTron. As soon as the band finishes playing before the game, Willie has an allotted time, down to the second, to fill before the team emerges onto the field.

"I'm basically a filler, but it's actually become a pretty big tradition here," he said. "I'm already (on Tuesday) preparing for what I'll be doing on Saturday, and I'm still sore from the game before. It's pretty time-consuming."

Summer is not a vacation for Willie, either.

"I was in two places in Kansas a week. I was in Kansas City one day, and then two days later I'd be in Wichita," he said. "If I was getting paid by the hour, I'd be making more money than (Coach Bill) Snyder, even if he made minimum wage. I'd be a millionaire by now."



Even though the money is not that good and his patience often gets tried by screaming fans, Willie is always happy to play.

"I like being able to go up, messing with people, and they can't do anything about it," Brian said. "You can go up to anyone and do things that you could never, ever do even in normal circumstances. You can go and rub people's bald heads or poke them in the belly and they laugh about it. I love it, but you do have to have the patience and personality for it.

"It is a job, and it does get boring, but I just try to keep in mind that for a lot of these kids and other people, it's their first time seeing Willie, and I try to give them a good experience. When I get letters from little kids telling me they love me, it pumps me back up to go back out there and have fun."

Pausing for a moment, Brian quietly adds, "Yeah, I think I will miss it when I graduate."

Stage design for 'Man of La Mancha' transforms McCain Auditorium into eery 16th-century prison

JAMI NELSON
staff reporter

Slabs of gray stone lie beneath decrepit bridges with no destinations, prisoners mill about in the shadows and dim light — McCain Auditorium has taken on a different look.

This prison room sets the scene for "Man of La Mancha," a production by K-State Theatre and the Department of Music. The performances will be at 8 p.m. Thursday through Saturday in McCain.

The play is set in a stone prison vault in Seville, Spain, at the end of the 16th century. Throughout the play, scenes change to places imagined in the mind of lead character, Miguel de Cervantes.

"Man of La Mancha" is the combined story of Cervantes' life and his novel "Don Quixote," Charlotte MacFarland, stage director, said. For this reason, MacFarland described it as "a play within a play."

In the production, Cervantes is thrown into the prison of Seville because he foreclosed on a church. He is confined with thieves and murderers, who rummage through his belongings and discover his manuscript of "Don Quixote." The prisoners and Cervantes decide to act out the novel, changing the prison into a castle and their dull lives to glorious ones. Cervantes refuses to see reality and urges other prisoners to live imaginative lives, MacFarland said.

"It becomes a play that deals with having ideals even in troubled life," she said. To emphasize this point, one of the musical numbers is "The Impossible Dream."

The moods and emotions of this production are not only presented in the lyrics and text, but also in the lighting and stage design.

The set gives the production a feeling of coldness and an overall eeriness, David Centers, scene designer, said. He said there was much planning put into the set design.

"Charlotte wanted a sense that there were lots of nooks and crannies, places for people to hide, where they could get away from execution," Centers said. "There are bridges to get from one place to another, but the prisoners have no access."

Creating the stage was no simple task, though. Preparations for the set began this summer.

"Charlotte and I started preliminary discussion in July. By the end of August, I had the design completed, and we began building the second week in September. It's been about an eight-week build," Centers said.

In the actual building process, Centers was assisted by scene shop supervisor LaVern Tiemeyer and five or six students.

"We've got quite a few man-hours in the actual build," Centers said. "I've worked at least 90 hours this last week."

PERFORMERS REHEARSE "Man of La Mancha" Tuesday night in McCain Auditorium. The performances will be at 8 p.m. Thursday through Saturday in McCain.

In addition to the set, the lighting also enhances the production's moods.

"Man of La Mancha" brought in a guest lighting designer, Craig Wolf, professor of design at San Diego State University.

"The set is wonderful to light because it's so dimensional, and it takes light so well," Wolf said.

He said he is using several techniques to create an atmosphere for this production.

"I tried to have a very distinct prison look and a quite different 'Man of La Mancha'/'Don Quixote' look," Wolf said. "I'm using a lot of gobos, or patterns put into lights, to give it texture. We're looking for light and shadow."

Wolf also said he is using a hazer, which puts a haze in the air, to show off the lighting and create atmosphere.

MacFarland said this production combines many aspects of theater.

"It has its very soft, gentle moments and its grand theatrical moments, too," she said.

To purchase tickets for "Man of La Mancha," contact the McCain Box Office at 532-6428 from noon to 6 p.m. Tickets are $8 for students and senior citizens and $11 for the general public.

Beach museum receives 2 awards

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

The Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art has won two awards from American School and University magazine.

Having been awarded a gold citation for its exhibition space and galleries in the magazine's August issue, the museum was chosen for its exterior qualities in the magazine's November annual architectural portfolio.

The project architects, Wiedeman Architects of Kansas City, Mo., and the university will receive the Louis Kahn Citation Award. The university will also receive a $1,000 scholarship to be used in any program.

The award is named for Louis Kahn, widely considered one of the giants of 20th-century American architecture. Kahn, who died in 1974, is most well-known for having designed the Kimbell Art Museum in Fort Worth, Texas.

Beach art museum director Nelson Britt said the awards are a wonderful compliment to the building.

Britt said the art museum was also awarded for work in concrete from the American Institute of Architects Kansas City, Kan., chapter.

He said the museum design was also submitted to several of the more prominent architectural magazine award programs, including that of Architectural Record.

Jerry Carter, director of facilities planning and university architect, said he is pleased the museum is earning recognition.

"I really feel that the art museum is causing discussion thanks to its design," Carter said. "You either really do like it or you really don't."

President Jon Wefald said he is especially happy the museum is winning design awards. He said he and his wife, Ruth Ann Wefald, were staunch supporters of building an art museum when they came to K-State in 1986.

"For both Ruth Ann and me, the art museum will always occupy a special place in our hearts because for so long — literally decades — K-State went without an art museum," Wefald said.

Wefald, who lives on campus only a block north from the museum, can look out his back windows and see the museum.

"As we see it day after day and week after week, it really comes together," he said. "The combination of material — the cement, the Kansas stone — are becoming more compelling all the time."

Lightning strikes plane

ANCHORAGE, Alaska — Lightning really can strike twice.

Just ask the crew of a Coast Guard C-130 that was struck by lightning Monday near Cold Bay. The same plane was struck by lightning on approach to the same airport Nov. 4, 1996.

The crew reported the plane took a hit at about 2:30 p.m. Monday. None of the seven crew members or 15 passengers were injured.

"The more that I checked into it, the more I laughed at it. The coincidences are pretty remarkable," said Lt. John Schneider, who was piloting the plane last year.

Just like last year, the lightning struck the radar dome on the plane's nose and exited through the tail during a snow storm.

"The exit wound goes out of the aircraft at the same point and apparently you could still see the marks left from last year. They're right next to each other," Coast Guard spokesman Tod Lyons said.

Cold Bay is on the Alaska Peninsula, about 625 miles southwest of Anchorage. Forecasters say lightning is rare in that part of the state.

Repairs were made to the radar systems Monday when the plane returned to its base in Kodiak, and it was back in service on Tuesday.

Schneider said he has no qualms about flying it again.

"We're not superstitious and nobody places any unusual significance on this, although there has been some talk about naming the plane Flash," he said.

Squirrel stashes nuts, nest in Suburban engine

MILWAUKEE — Why was Jodie Lasky's car engine racing? Maybe the squirrel inside was feeling extra peppy from all the nuts.

Mechanics found more than 100 black walnuts and a grass-lined squirrel nest in the engine compartment of the 1997 GMC Suburban.

Lasky, of Fox Point, who hadn't driven the vehicle in about two weeks, had it towed to the shop Friday at closing time because the motor was racing. Mechanics took a look inside Monday.

"I've seen squirrel nests in cars before," said Tony Nardi, service manager at Rank & Son Buick, GMC Truck. "Sometimes they chew on the insulation and use that stuff in their nests, but I've never seen anything like this."

Sol Bunn, an employee of the dealership, said the vehicle was not damaged.

"There was just too much grass and too many nuts and stuff jammed up in the throttle linkage," he said.

"But stuff like this isn't covered by the guarantee," Nardi added.

Pet goldfish cured; he's back in swim of things

RICHLAND, Wash. — The tumor was removed successfully, and the patient is doing swimmingly — appropriate for a goldfish.

Sharkie had been laboring along for about 18 months with a tumor growing near his head when veterinarian Charles Coleman was called for a consult with the fish, actually a miniature carp. Goldfish are members of the carp family.

The fish weighed about a pound, but about 15 percent of that was a translucent, creepy material that made it a struggle for Sharkie to stay upright, said Don Rokkan, whose 11-year-old daughter, Lainey, owns the fish.

"Most people would have used the flush technique," Rokkan said. "I was expecting to lose him, but I wanted to save him for my daughter. If there was something that could be done, we had to do it."

Coleman's exotic clientele has included lizards, snakes, wallabies and a calcium-deficient crocodile that he put on a dog-food diet.

After examining Sharkie, Coleman checked some reference books and went to work on Sharkie. He pumped isoflurane, a gaseous anesthetic, into the water. When Sharkie relaxed sufficiently, Coleman used a scalpel to remove the tumor. He then cauterized the blood vessels and put Sharkie in a wake-up tank. Lab results on the tumor are due later this week.

For Rokkan, it was $100 well spent.

"He's very bright and vibrant looking," Rokkan said.

Halt in U.N. arms inspections allows Iraqis to hide equipment

ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS — Taking advantage of a halt to U.N. arms inspections, Iraqis have hidden sensitive equipment and tampered with U.N. surveillance cameras, a senior U.N. official said Wednesday.

The chief U.N. weapons inspector, Richard Butler, said his teams would try to inspect two sites Thursday to establish the whereabouts of material that has been moved.

Butler suspended U.N. weapons inspections in Iraq last week after Baghdad ordered the expulsion of American members of his team. Butler said the inspections would go ahead as planned Monday, but they have been scrubbed for three straight days because Iraq refused to admit American inspectors.

The inspections are meant to verify whether Iraq has destroyed its weapons of mass destruction. That was a condition for ending the 1991 Persian Gulf War, in which a U.S.-led coalition drove Iraqi forces from Kuwait.

The United Nations also maintains surveillance cameras at sensitive sites suspected of producing illegal weapons. The inspectors are trying to determine if Iraq has complied with U.N. orders to destroy all long-range missiles and weapons of mass destruction.

In a letter to the Security Council, Butler said there was evidence the Iraqis have been tampering with surveillance equipment since the field inspections have not taken place.

"Significant pieces of dual-capable equipment, subject to monitoring by the (inspectors') remote-camera monitoring system have been moved out of view of the cameras," Butler said.

"The equipment includes, for example, gyroscope-rotor balancing equipment which could be used to balance prohibited missile gyroscopes," he added.

There was no comment from the council to the letter, a copy of which was obtained by The Associated Press.

In the letter, Butler, an Australian, noted that movement of the equipment is prohibited without U.N. permission "and the equipment concerned is subject to continuous camera monitoring precisely because of its easy adaptation to prohibited activities."

He said it would take only a few hours to adapt some of the sensitive equipment to produce seed stocks of biological warfare agent.

"Furthermore, it appears that cameras may have been intentionally tampered with, lenses covered and lighting turned off in the facilities under monitoring," Butler said.

Butler said he planned to send a team Thursday to inspect two of the facilities where cameras might have been tampered with to establish the whereabouts of the equipment, which has been moved.

Destruction of the equipment is also the main condition for lifting crippling economic sanctions imposed on Iraq after President Saddam Hussein sent his troops into Kuwait in August 1990.

Opening statements delivered in trial of man accused of CIA agency rampage

ASSOCIATED PRESS

FAIRFAX, Va. — The widow of one of two CIA employees killed when a gunman opened fire outside the agency's gates wept as she told a jury on Wednesday how her husband protected her.

Frank Darling shouted, "Get down!" after he was shot in the back as he and his wife, Judy Becker Darling, were stopped in traffic entering CIA headquarters, she testified in the capital murder trial of Mir Aimal Kasi.

The Pakistani man fired indiscriminately into cars outside the CIA on Jan. 25, 1993, partly because he was angry about the U.S. bombing of Iraq, a prosecutor told jurors earlier.

Judy Darling said she followed her 28-year-old husband's instructions and ducked her head beneath the car's glove compartment. She stayed there as she heard sounds like "balloons popping" all around the car.

"I picked my head up again, and when I did that it looked like I was looking down the barrel of a gun," she said.

She ducked again, she said.

"When I looked up Frank was shot in the head," she said in a soft, strained voice. Then, Judy Darling broke down.

"There was skin hanging everywhere, and I just jumped out of the car and ran," she said.

Commonwealth's Attorney Robert F. Horan Jr. said in his opening statement that Kasi, who could face the death penalty if convicted, was angry at both the United States and Israel.

"He said he was torn between attacking the Israeli embassy in Washington, D.C., and the CIA. He decided he was going to attack the CIA because he felt the people would be less armed. They would be less likely to have weapons than the Israelis," Horan said.

Assistant Public Defender Frank Romano said the defense will not dispute prosecutors' claims that a gun found in Kasi's apartment belonged to the defendant or that his fingerprints were found on empty bullet casings at the scene of the shootings.

He said jurors must decide whether prosecutors prove that Kasi is guilty of capital murder.

"Your function is not to determine whether five cars were shot into in front of the CIA and that Mr. Kasi took responsibility for that," Romano said. "Your function is to determine whether the 10 charges against Mr. Kasi are proven at the end of this case."

Horan said Kasi was angry about the U.S. involvement in the Gulf War.

"Because the U.S. was doing bombings in Iraq — a Muslim country — he thought that was unfair," the prosecutor said. Kasi also told the FBI agent who arrested him in Pakistan in June that he thought the CIA exerted too much influence abroad, especially in Muslim countries, Horan said.

Kasi, 33, also said he stopped firing when he did "because there was no one left to shoot" and that his religion prevented him from killing women, Horan said.

12-year-old charged with possession of firearm, suspended from school

GARDNER, Kan. — A 12-year-old boy was charged with bringing a handgun to school, a day after it went off as he tried to take it back from a boy who was going to bring it to the office, police said. No one was hurt.

The boy, and another boy accused of having a knife, were suspended Tuesday pending a hearing. The shooting Monday at Nike Middle School led district officials to search lockers at the school and at Gardner High School. They found nothing illegal.

The 12-year-old was charged in Johnson County District Court with being a juvenile in possession of a firearm, possessing a firearm on school property and making a criminal threat.

The judge ruled that the boy should remain under court supervision until his next court appearance next week, but said he could be released if his parents could find an appropriate inpatient treatment program.

Prosecutors said they had no plans to seek adult charges unless investigators turned up additional information.

"Our No. 1 concern is to keep him detained so he doesn't hurt himself or others," District Attorney Paul Morrison said. He said the boy, who had recently moved to the area with his family from southern Missouri, had not been in trouble before, but was experiencing family problems.

UNABOMBER the trial

The key events

- May 25, 1978 The first Unabomber bombing — a package found at a University of Illinois parking lot in Chicago — is brought to the return addressee at Northwestern University, where it explodes, injuring one.
- May 9, 1979 One person is injured at Northwestern University.
- Nov. 15, 1979 Twelve people suffer smoke inhalation after a bomb explodes in the cargo hold during an American Airlines flight, forcing an emergency landing near Washington, D.C.
- June 10, 1980 The United Airlines president is injured at his home in the Chicago area.
- Oct. 8, 1981 Bomb is placed in a classroom at the University of Utah in Salt Lake City. No one is injured.
- May 5, 1982 One person is injured at Vanderbilt University in Nashville, Tenn. The package was addressed to a professor.
- July 2, 1982 A professor is injured in a faculty lounge at the University of California, Berkeley.
- May 15, 1985 One person is injured by a bomb in a computer room at Berkeley.
- June 13, 1985 A package mailed to Boeing Co. in Auburn, Wash., was safely disarmed.
- Nov. 15, 1985 Two people are injured by a package mailed to a professor at the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor.
- Dec. 11, 1985 The first fatality. Sacramento, Calif., computer rental store owner Hugh Scrutton is killed when he picks up a bomb outside his business.
- Feb. 20, 1987 The Unabomber is spotted. A witness in a Salt Lake City computer store sees a man in a hooded sweat shirt and aviator sunglasses placing a bomb. Unabomber attacks cease for six years.
- June 22, 1993 University of California-San Francisco geneticist Dr. Charles Epstein is injured by a bomb sent to his home. The package is postmarked Sacramento.
- June 24, 1993 Yale University computer expert David Gelernter is injured in his office by a bomb. The package is postmarked Sacramento.
- June 1993 The Unabomber communicates for the first time in a letter to the New York Times explaining his eco-anarchist views. A federal task force is set up.
- Dec. 10, 1994 Advertising executive Thomas Mosser is killed when a bomb explodes at his New Jersey home. The package was postmarked San Francisco.
- April 24, 1995 The final bombing. Timber industry lobbyist Gilbert Murray is killed opening a package in his Sacramento office. The package was postmarked Oakland, Calif.
- Sept. 19, 1995 The Washington Post and New York Times jointly publish the Unabomber's 35,000-word manifesto, "Industrial Society and Its Future," after the serial bomber's promise to stop his attacks.
- February 1996 David Kaczynski, after reading the manifesto and comparing it to letters written by his brother, Ted, communicates his suspicions to the FBI.
- April 3, 1996 Ted Kaczynski is arrested at his mountain cabin in Montana. He is indicted in Sacramento for the Scrutton and Murray killings and the attacks on Epstein and Gelernter, and in New Jersey for the Mosser killing.

"Our goal is to explain the life of Ted Kaczynski," co-counsel Judy Clarke

Kaczynski was unwitting architect of own defense

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — Decades ago, when Theodore Kaczynski was hammering together his shack in the Montana woods, he unwittingly built his defense against charges that he is the enigmatic, deadly Unabomber.

The tiny, primitive cabin — found crammed full of incriminating evidence, including letters, a diary and an unexploded bomb — will be trucked to Sacramento by Kaczynski's court-appointed defense lawyers. They believe a tour of the shack will take jurors inside Kaczynski's mind and the strange world he inhabited for 25 years.

Was he the Unabomber who terrorized America for 17 years? Was this the anti-technology terrorist who railed against industrialized society in a 35,000-word manifesto? No one seems to be contesting they are one and the same — not even Kaczynski himself.

But perhaps by explaining Kaczynski to the jury — by showing them this hovel — his lawyers can prevent his execution.

"You really cannot understand this guy's life unless you can get in that cabin," said defense attorney Quin Denvir. "The cabin is 10-by-12 feet and 13 feet tall. It had no running water, no electricity, no toilet — not even an outhouse. And the irony was that a quarter-mile away was electricity and water that he could have hooked into."

Government lawyers oppose the demonstration and want to substitute a scale model of the structure. But in an interview with The Associated Press, Denvir and co-counsel Judy Clarke indicated they will fight to use the actual building — because if Theodore Kaczynski has a defense, it is somewhere in that shack.

"Our goal is to explain the life of Ted Kaczynski," said Clarke, a veteran of another high-profile case — the defense of Susan Smith, charged with the drowning deaths of her two young sons in South Carolina.

"If I were on the jury, I'd want to see the cabin," Clarke said.

Both Clarke and Denvir hiked to the site of the Montana cabin to document and understand the life of deprivation Kaczynski chose.

"His only heat in the Montana winters was from a potbellied stove," Clarke said. "And he slept on a piece of plywood with a layer of foam on top."

With the defense planning to argue Kaczynski suffered from a mental disease, paranoid schizophrenia, the cabin offers a window into the darkness that engulfed the soul of this once brilliant and promising math professor.

"This is not an idyllic, rustic cabin with a refrigerator and a wet bar," Denvir said. "It barely had a window. It was very dark, very cramped and crammed with stuff. And he lived there for almost 25 years."

As the Nov. 12 trial date nears, speculation has mounted as to what defense Kaczynski will present in a case so heavy with incriminating evidence that, to a nonlawyer, it would seem almost impossible to defend.

In recent weeks, prosecutors have disclosed the contents of Kaczynski's diaries, in which he allegedly documented his bomb making and wrote of "assassinating" California timber industry lobbyist Gilbert Murray.

"I have no respect for law or morality," Kaczynski wrote.

"This is a defense lawyer's nightmare," said Laurie Levenson, associate dean of Loyola University Law School in Los Angeles. "This is a guy convicting himself. ... Almost all the cards are stacked against Kaczynski, but they are cards that he created."

The point, Levenson said, "is avoiding the death penalty."

STORIES BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

"I don't see this as a tough case," former San Francisco U.S. Attorney Joe Russoniello

Meticulous Kaczynski handed prosecutors their best weapons

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — If Theodore Kaczynski is convicted as the Unabomber, he will have painstakingly crafted the prosecutions' most damaging weapons himself.

The journals so meticulously kept by the former mathematics professor in his Montana cabin hideaway are the core of the government's effort to prove Kaczynski carried out a deadly 17-year bombing spree that, at its height, disrupted air travel and the U.S. mail.

Those writings alone might come close to carrying the prosecution case. But investigators found a treasure trove of other evidence in his cabin along with the journals: A Unabomber-style explosive device. The original manuscript of the Unabomber manifesto. The nine-digit code known only to the Unabomber and to those he corresponded with. And a DNA saliva match on stamps taken from two Unabomber letters.

"I don't see this as a tough case," former San Francisco U.S. Attorney Joe Russoniello said. "You don't have conflicting evidence. You don't have multiple defendants pointing the finger at each other. You don't have issues of self-defense or instigation. And you don't have an empathetic defendant."

Kaczynski, 55, faces trial Wednesday for four bombings that killed two Sacramento men and maimed two San Francisco Bay-area academics. If convicted, he could face the death penalty.

At the trial, prosecutors intend to let Kaczynski convict himself with his journal entries.

On April 21, 1979, he wrote: "I came back to the Chicago area in May, mainly for one reason: So that I could more safely attempt to murder a scientist, businessman, or the like. Before I left Montana I made a bomb in a kind of box, designed to explode when the box was opened."

One charge against Kaczynski is the 1985 murder of computer store owner Hugh Scrutton in Sacramento, killed when he picked up a package behind his building.

In his journal, Kaczynski wrote: "Experiment 976. Dec. 11, 1985 I planted bomb disguised to look like scrap of lumber behind Rentech Compute store in Sacramento ... the 'operator' (owner? manager?) of the store was killed, 'blown to bits.'"

Some charges against Kaczynski involve mail bombs that crippled Yale University computer scientist David Gelernter and University of California-San Francisco geneticist Dr. Charles Epstein in June 1993.

From Kaczynski's log: "I sent these devices during June, 1993. They detonated as they should have."

Russoniello said there are few ways to refute the journals. The defense could try to paint Kaczynski as a "Unabomber wannabe," who copied what the real Unabomber did into his journal.

But other trial exhibits hamstring that approach. One of the most damaging is the intact bomb found in the Montana cabin.

The Unabomber developed a highly individual style of bomb construction. Some elements of that style — his use of wood, the meticulous way he polished the surfaces — were made public, but

Judge will rule no earlier than Monday in au pair case

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. — British au pair Louise Woodward and those anxiously watching her murder case on both sides of the Atlantic will have to wait until at least Monday for a judge to decide her fate.

Judge Hiller B. Zobel, who is away at a conference the rest of this week, plans to post his ruling on the Internet through legal and media sites.

> "It's been a hard job trying to keep [Louise Woodward's] spirits up. We just keep comforting her and telling her everything will be OK."
> • Gary Woodward, father

Defense lawyers asked Zobel on Tuesday to void the 19-year-old's second-degree murder conviction, order a new trial or reduce the verdict to manslaughter.

The prosecution argued that last week's verdict should stand.

The jury found that Woodward had shaken and slammed 8-month-old Matthew Eappen on Feb. 4, the day she called 911 to say the boy was having trouble breathing. Matthew died five days later.

Supporters of Woodward believe she is innocent or is guilty only of manslaughter. About 25 people kept a vigil outside the courthouse.

Meanwhile, the agency that brought Woodward to America defended its decision to fund her legal costs, and said EF Au Pair satisfactorily trained Woodward and thoroughly reviewed her references.

Most importantly, the agency said in a statement released late Wednesday, Woodward spent three months in the Eappen home "during which they were able to observe her interacting with their children and come to their own judgment as to whether she was responsible enough to be left in sole charge of them ... their assessment completely endorsed our original judgment."

Gary and Susan Woodward, Louise Woodward's parents, said they have been visiting their 19-year-old daughter in prison on a regular basis.

"It's been a hard job trying to keep her spirits up," Gary Woodward told WHDH-TV in Boston.

"We just keep comforting her and telling her everything will be OK," he said.

Deborah Eappen, mother of the slain child, said she hoped Woodward would take responsibility for her son's death.

She said she was not swayed by Woodward's emotional outburst in court after the guilty verdict was announced, calling it "a very pathetic statement."

As she dissolved into tears, Woodward cried out, "How could they do this to me? I'm only 19."

Support for Woodward is strong in her tiny hometown of Elton, where Rose Russell said she talked to Woodward's mother Wednesday.

The mother told her Woodward had been depressed since the verdict, but was encouraged after seeing television reports about the support in her hometown.

"But since she's seen this footage, it's given her spirits a tremendous lift," Russell said. "She feels far more confidence, far less alone and as far as I'm concerned, we've achieved our desired effect."

others the FBI kept secret.

Prosecutors are confident they can show that the bomb found in Kaczynski's cabin was the work of the Unabomber.

There is a danger with so much forensic evidence, however.

"The prosecution's biggest challenge is to avoid creating a confusion in evidence that is very technical by its nature," Russoniello said.

With such a wealth of ammunition pointing to Kaczynski, prosecutors are prepared to face a mental defect defense, although they have claimed in court papers that Kaczynski fails to qualify. Federal law for such defenses was tightened after a jury found John W. Hinckley Jr. innocent by reason of insanity in the attempted assassination of President Reagan in 1981.

Kaczynski's recent refusal to undergo tests by government psychiatrists will hurt his case, even if the judge allows the defense, Russoniello noted.

And prosecutors have another way of countering any sympathy the defense might generate by reciting Kaczynski's mental traumas.

"The prosecution is going to portray this man as a reclusive coward," Russoniello said. "They want to excite the jury (against Kaczynski) by showing that these were acts of extraordinary cowardice."

But the best counter to the mental defect defense is once again Kaczynski's own writings, which give a social and political rationale for his crimes, he said.

"They show clear deliberation on his part, a real plan," Russoniello said. "He is basically acknowledging that certain bombings are manifestations of a desire he expressed months earlier," rather than random, irrational acts.

And prosecutors have one final ace up the sleeve.

Since Kaczynski was arrested on April 3, 1996, not one bomb, not one letter, not one phone call has come from the killer known as the Unabomber.

And that, they will say, is because the Unabomber is Theodore Kaczynski.

seek the death penalty, despite pleas from Kaczynski's brother, David, who tipped the FBI to the possibility that Kaczynski was the Unabomber.

Denvir and Clarke declined to say they are purely on a lifesaving mission. But their focus on Kaczynski's mental state points in that direction.

Legal experts say Kaczynski could not have hoped for two more dedicated defenders.

Denvir, 57, has represented indigent defendants for decades both in private practice and in the public sector.

In June 1996 he was tapped for the job of chief federal public defender in this state capital. Three weeks later, Kaczynski was arrested and Denvir was on the case.

He asked Clarke to join the defense. Clarke, 45, a federal public defender for Washington and Idaho, drew nationwide attention defending Smith.

The young mother was convicted of drowning her two small sons but eluded the death penalty in the Union, S.C., trial.

Clarke, who has spent most of her professional life as a public defender, said, "I've wanted to do this ever since I can remember. I thought that being Perry Mason would be a good idea."

In the Kaczynski case, both Clarke and Denvir say the death penalty complicates their task and will prolong the trial, but it won't do much to alter their client's prospects. Denvir notes that if Kaczynski is convicted, parole is out of the question.

"If he's convicted, he will die in prison," Denvir said. "The only question is whether he dies by lethal injection."

Counseling Services, presented similar budgets for his department. Fifty-four percent of the budget comes from the privilege fee, 41 percent comes from the state, 3 percent comes from service fees and 2 percent comes from grants.

His "A" plan, with a 7.5-percent increase in funds, covers all services and staff with no new employees or programs.

The "B" plan would require the loss of one intern counselor. The "C" plan would drop one intern and one full-time staff member.

Both Newton and Zweimiller presented "D" plans, to show what would happen if their departments received a 14-percent and a 10-percent increase in funds, respectively.

University Couseling Services would be able to pay for a full-time learning skills assessment coordinator, Newton said. This position, currently being funded by grants, would be able to test and administer services to the increasing number of K-State students with special learning disorders, such as attention deficit disorder.

Zweimiller said Lafene could keep its service and staff, and spend about $33,500 to replace the network servers to which the computers connect.

According to the Lafene budget proposal, the center serves more than 1,000 students a week for health and nutrition education, community outreach and treatment for the sick or injured. Its funds for physical services would come entirely from students — about two-thirds from privilege fees, one-third from fees for service.

The proposed expenditures for physical services this year total $3,853,679. Counseling services expenditures total $442,339. About 97 percent of both budgets pay for salaries, Tarara said.

alternates, includes several current or former government employees, including one who works in the federal court system and one who worked as a temporary CIA employee during the 1950s.

Frank Darling and Lansing Bennett, 66, were killed and two other CIA workers and a telephone company employee were wounded in the Washington, D.C., suburb of Langley.

Kasi's attorneys are not expected to present an insanity defense. But defense attorney Richard Goemann told potential jurors that if Kasi is convicted, he will argue at the sentencing phase that Kasi is mentally ill and has brain damage.

Advertising Design
Internship / Graphic Design — Art 582

If you are a graphic design major and can work at least 12 hours per week, you can earn three hours of credit in graphic design. Prerequisites must be met and instructor's permission is required.

The experience you earn in the spring could qualify you to apply for a paid, part-time position in the summer and fall.

Come to 113 Kedzie from 8 a.m.-3 p.m for more information and an application.

Peddle your bike.

Need to sell your old bike to make room for that new one you want? Put your ad in the Collegian classifieds. You'll pedal that new bike home in no time.

State to begin reducing taxes for singles

SINGLE TAXPAYERS WILL HAVE LESS MONEY WITHHELD FROM PAYCHECKS STARTING JAN. 1

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The state Revenue Department is mailing new tax tables to employers this week to be used to lower the amount of state income taxes to be withheld from the paychecks of single taxpayers starting Jan. 1.

The 1997 Legislature passed legislation to equalize tax rates for single and married taxpayers who file joint returns over a four-year period. The first reductions begin in 1998.

Passage of the legislation followed a court test of the state's practice in the past decade of taxing single income taxpayers at a higher rate than married taxpayers who file jointly.

A district court judge ruled the practice unconstitutional, but the state Supreme Court reversed that ruling and said the state legally could do it. But as a matter of fairness, Gov. Bill Graves and the Legislature agreed to phase out the tax rate differential.

Employers will start at the first of the year to withhold less from single taxpayers' paychecks, and by tax year 2002 the rates will be equal.

An estimated 550,000 single, head of household and married taxpayers filing separately will be affected by the reduced withholding rates.

The equalization of the income tax rates is estimated to reduce state revenue by $16.3 million in the first six months of 1998, then $29 million in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1999, and $41.5 million in the fiscal year ending in mid-2000.

Prosecutors turn from emotion to real motives in Nichols' trial

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DENVER — A Kansas rancher testified Thursday that Oklahoma City bombing suspect Terry Nichols was with Timothy McVeigh the last time he saw him, the same day prosecutors allege Nichols stole explosives from a nearby quarry.

When Timothy Donahue stopped by Nichols' house on Sept. 30, 1994, to buy a waterbed and give him a final paycheck, he saw Nichols and McVeigh working on Nichols' pickup truck. McVeigh had a scraggly beard with hair down to about the middle of his ears, the rancher recalled.

"He looked a little bit shabby," Donahue said. "I was assuming this was the guy that was going to pay him (Nichols) twice what I had been and it kind of surprised me. It didn't look like he had that much money."

Nichols had told the rancher, for whom he had worked, that he was going to go into the gun show business with a friend.

Prosecutors have alleged Nichols broke into a quarry in Marion, Kan., near

KEY TO LEADERSHIP

"Leadership is getting out of your comfort zone and making a difference in someone's life — to give someone else a chance."
● Leo Prieto, Hispanic American Leadership Organization president

HALO president excels in leadership roles

STORY BY CLAUDETTE RILEY

NO MATTER where he goes in life, Leo Prieto wants to hold the door open for someone else.

Prieto, junior in pre-medicine and Spanish with a secondary major in Latin American studies, said he believes part of his campus leadership roles involve helping other students feel like they belong.

"I tell people that if I can do it, they can do it," he said. "Leadership is getting out of your comfort zone and making a difference in someone's life — to give someone else a chance."

One of Prieto's priorities as president of Hispanic American Leadership Organization was to make sure students knew how to get involved during October's Hispanic Awareness Month.

Although Prieto said it was a challenge to plan a month of events and speakers shortly after the fall semester began, he thought it was a success.

"Our main goal was to get more people involved," he said. "It did well on campus, but we have more community activities planned for Cinco de Mayo next semester."

The 40 active members of HALO often provide him with the feeling of an extended family, he said.

"We're like a family away from home," he said. "It's a small world. It's a big university, but once you make friends and find your way around, it becomes home, too."

Prieto was born in Chihuahua, Mexico, and moved to Garden City, Kan., at age 3. During high school, he was recognized for academic excellence, and as a senior, he served as the first Hispanic student body president and was chosen athlete of the year.

An active member of the large Hispanic community in his racially diverse hometown, Prieto is fluent in Spanish and has volunteered as a translator. He completed his application to become a United States citizen during his freshman year at K-State. He now also serves as an arts and sciences senator.

"I have a lot of pride in where I come from," he said. "It's the motivation of my culture that pushes me. In everything I do, I hope I let people know that you can be Hispanic and proud of it and accomplish your goals."

One of Prieto's goals was to attend K-State. He was heavily recruited by Pat Bosco, dean of student life, as a leadership scholar.

"Leo came to K-State from Garden City as an excellent student. We recruited Leo very aggressively. He is just the type of student we specifically target as an outstanding high school leader," Bosco said.

Bosco said that as a multicultural ambassador coordinator through the Office of Admissions, Prieto actively recruits new students for K-State. He also represents K-State at college fairs and high schools.

"He has a great passion for what is important to him. His sincerity is instantly recognizable, and he has a great enthusiasm for what he believes in," Bosco said.

Coordinating the multicultural ambassadors means Prieto has an increased opportunity to reach out to minority students. He said students who want to attend college might not know all the options available for overcoming any obstacles in their way.

"Students from different cultures, races or backgrounds need to know they can make it at K-State," Prieto said.

Senate fills vacancies, allocates spring funding to student organizations

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
staff writer

Student senators made appointments and allocations to student groups before moving on to the brunt of their business at Thursday night's meeting.

After more than four hours of various business and debate about proposed changes in Student Governing Association election guidelines, Senate still had not voted on the final package of election rule changes. At press time, eight amendments to the original bill had been proposed.

Also toward the end of Senate business was a proposed reduction in the Bramlage Coliseum Repair and Replacement Fee.

Other business that was final at press time included the following:

● Resolution 97/98/42 passed by unanimous consent. This resolution approved Jamie Wetig to fill a vacancy as student senator for the College of Education. Wetig was elected by the Education Council.

● Resolution 97/98/43 passed by unanimous consent. This resolution appointed Engineering Sen. Chris Bainter as chair of the Student Affairs and Social Services standing committee.

● Resolution 97/98/44 passed by unanimous consent. This resolution appointed Senate Vice Chair Tracey Mann to the Educational Opportunity Fund Committee; Student Affairs and Social Services Chair Chris Bainter to the Legal Services Advisory Board, Council on Parking Operations and Holton Hall Advisory Board; and Arts and Sciences Sen. Lisa Dethloff and Engineering Sen. Elizabeth

So Barney, the idol of millions of children, loves everybody, right? Guess again.
Barney's owners want the Famous San Diego Chicken on the butcher's block.

THE CHICKEN & THE DINOSAUR

STORY BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SAN DIEGO — Barney's owners have filed a copyright and trademark infringement lawsuit against the Famous San Diego Chicken for ridiculing and assaulting a Barney-like character during performances at baseball and basketball games across the country.

Texas-based Lyons Partnership said the red and yellow chicken mascot, Ted Giannoulas, was first notified in 1994 that using the Barney-like costume in his act constituted infringement of Lyons' trademarks and copyrights and violated state and federal law.

"Specifically, Giannoulas would punch, flip, stand on and otherwise assault the putative 'Barney,'" the lawsuit alleges. "Despite such notice, Lyons received subsequent reports of 'Barney' appearing with the Famous Chicken at games of the Detroit Pistons, Chicago Cubs, Seattle Mariners and others."

The company wants a permanent injunction against use of the dinosaur costume and a minimum $100,000 for each time Giannoulas has performed a skit with the dinosaur in it.

The complaint said that because Barney consumers are young children, they aren't likely to know the difference between the real Barney and the one getting knocked around by San Diego's infamous fowl.

"It's nothing more than to be mean-spirited," Giannoulas said Wednesday of the federal lawsuit filed last week in Texas. "There have been plenty of parodies of Barney. They probably think that the Chicken is easy picking."

Kenneth Fitzgerald, an attorney for the chicken, said the act is a parody protected under the Copyright Act, trademark laws and the First Amendment.

"By engaging in slapstick physical comedy with a break-dancing 'Barney,' The Famous San Diego Chicken humorously portrays the real Barney as naive, gullible, clumsy and just plain goofy," Fitzgerald said in a statement.

But Lyons' attorneys said in the complaint that continued use of the costume has caused irreparable injury, including "consumer confusion, diversion of trade and dilution of the distinctive quality of the valuable Barney trademark."

Police called after irate student threatens Parking Services office

Parking Services heard from another unsatisfied customer Monday afternoon, but this time the police were called in.

A student made a threat via phone call to the Edwards Hall office in regard to a wheel lock and several unpaid parking tickets, Parking Services Director Darwin Abbott said.

Richard Herrman, K-State Police lieutenant, said the student threatened to "kick-you-know-what. Only he used the word."

Because the employee who answered the phone thought the student sounded agitated, a campus police officer was on hand, Abbott said.

A campus police employee said unhappy phone calls are common for Parking Services, but it is rare for them to be extreme enough for Parking Services to request assistance from the police.

The student apologized after arriving and reportedly didn't mean to scare anyone. The parking tickets still have to be paid, Abbott said.

"He was much calmer once he got here," Herrman said.

Herrman said the incident is in the hands of a district attorney for a potential criminal threat charge.

Light cigarettes' design cancels benefits, increases cancer risk

ATLANTA — So-called light cigarettes are just as dangerous as regular ones, in part because smokers unwittingly cover up the air holes around the filter that are supposed to dilute the cancer-causing agents, government scientists said Thursday.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention estimated that two-thirds of U.S. smokers don't know the vents along the side of the cigarette are there to reduce the tar, nicotine and carbon monoxide in smoke. One reason: The holes are almost impossible to see.

"That makes low-tar cigarettes somewhat of a sham in terms of providing any health benefit," said Michael Eriksen of the CDC Office on Smoking and Health.

Smokers would have to use a magnifying glass just to find the holes. To avoid covering them, they would have to hold the cigarette below the filter, and barely press the cigarette against their lips, Eriksen said.

In addition, smokers take more and deeper puffs to get the same amount of nicotine, so they also inhale more tar — a phenomenon reported in previous studies this year.

Earlier this week, a study in the Journal of the National Cancer Institute found that light, low-tar and filter-tipped cigarettes have increased a type of lung cancer that occurs deep in the lung. The reason is that smokers of these cigarettes inhale more deeply to get the same nicotine jolt.

Bloomingdale's keeping Santa; Toys 'R' Us to use scanners instead

NEW YORK — Grinch begone, Bloomingdale's declared Thursday. Of course, Santa will be in the store for kids and families at yuletide, said the upscale department store.

Bloomingdale's flagship store fired off a communique of solidarity with Santa after a published report that he had become a passé geezer who would remain in exile at the North Pole this season.

The New York Post had quoted an unidentified Bloomie's spokeswoman as saying: "Usually we have a Santa Claus here the whole season. But it's not something we're doing this year."

She said he might make an occasional appearance.

Toys 'R' Us, meanwhile, is scrapping the Santa image, the newspaper said. References to Santa are being replaced with a toy registry for children. Instead of dropping off "Dear Santa" letters at stores, kids can use hand-held scanners to register — much like potential brides and grooms — for toys.

Society of Automotive Engineers builds, races cars for competition

AMY BICKEL
staff reporter

Brian Ruff first became interested in the Mini Baja car when he saw one at the All-University Open House his senior year in high school.

Now a senior in mechanical engineering, Ruff and 30 other Society of Automotive Engineers members are working during their free hours to make a new Baja car and a Formula car for this school year's competitions.

K-State's Society of Automotive Engineers chapter has participated in the Baja event for seven years. This is its first time to enter the Formula car event.

"The charter of our organization is to advance engineering education at K-State," Ruff, president of the club, said. "We use what we learn at school to do something productive."

Baja cars are built to race over dirt, rocks and other obstacles at about 30 mph. Cars are judged on maneuverability, written reports and endurance, which is how many miles the car will cover in four hours.

The Formula car competition is based mostly on a 26-mile endurance race on pavement. The car can reach speeds of 70 to 80 mph.

"Our (Formula) car is going to be reliable," Chad Halepeska, senior in mechanical engineering, said.

Halepeska said he has been doing a lot of the work on the Formula car.

"There's a cash prize for best rookie car, and K-State will have it in May," he said.

The club will participate in two Baja car competitions with about 60 teams this spring in Milwaukee and El Paso, Texas. The Formula car competition is in May in Detroit with about 75 teams competing.

The club placed 23rd in last year's event, and members hope to place high in both events with lighter cars.

Ruff said anyone in an engineering or physical science major can join the society and help work on the cars.

"We started making the cars last spring," Ruff said. "We plan to have them rolling by mid-January so we have time to work the bugs out of them."

When designing the Baja car, a cost of $2,500 per unit for a production run of 4,000 must be maintained, and formula cars cannot exceed $8,500 for a production run of 1,000.

Members said much of the money used to build the car was through fund-raisers, soliciting companies and receiving parts from companies for free or at a discount.

"Students design and build most everything on the cars," Steve Schrag, vice president of the club and a four-year member, said. "We don't build the engines, but all other things are made and designed by us."

Schrag said those participating had to be ready for the unexpected to happen at the last minute.

"If you can't do stuff on the spot and make due with what you have, you're toast," he said. "There's something to always fix right before the competition."

Ruff said different companies were represented or helped sponsor the competitions and looked for students involved in it.

"Most of us would like careers in this field, and we can make job connections with people in this industry," he said.

Ruff said most of the members love working on cars, and this was one way to have fun without going home and working in the garage.

"I just can't figure out people who don't love cars," Ruff said. "I guess we're all nuts. That's the trait we all have in common."

Members said 30 years ago learning was more hands-on. Now with classes more theory-oriented, they find the projects give them an opportunity to gain that hands-on experience.

Halepeska said he has been in the club for three years, and every year it gets better with more people participating in the club.

"We have something to show for our work," he said. "I've always wanted to get involved with race cars, and this is the way to do it."

Shire members resurrect Middle Age customs

TONYA ALLOWAY
staff reporter

About a thousand years ago, a Danish viking named Toke Ormsson was born in Ireland. After a lifetime of gold raids, at the age of 83, he was swept overboard by a wave on his trip back home from a raid.

Although history cites this as his death, Toke is alive and well in Manhattan today. Some might know him as Mike Prohaska, but when he's in his armor, making boots or fighting an enemy with his sword and shield, he doesn't answer to Mike.

Prohaska is a member of the Shire of Spinning Winds, one of the oldest shires in the Calontir Kingdom of the Society for Creative Anachronism, a worldwide organization that studies and recreates traditions of the Middle Ages.

Each member of the shire chooses either a specific character or a specific group to portray. The members research the character and re-create the life that took place so many years ago.

Although the group's purpose includes education, Prohaska said the main idea is to have fun.

"Why do you put heavy armor on and let younger, faster people beat the holy snot out of you?" Prohaska said. "It's stupid to do it if you're not having fun."

The shire is made up of history buffs who are interested in the time period they are portraying, Prohaska said.

The society has feasts, revels, courts, classes, tournaments and wars, but Prohaska said no one has ever died during the fights.

"We have limited violence here," he said. "People have to be properly trained and approved before they can use each weapon they want to use."

The society started about 30 years ago at the University of Southern California in Berkeley when several history majors had a costume party.

"It's basically a costume party that never ended," Prohaska said.

The local chapter started in 1978.

As knight's marshal of the shire, Prohaska is in charge of making sure the fighting arts are practiced properly.

Kathleen Hays, chataline for the shire, is in charge of greeting newcomers and providing information. She said the main things the shire stresses are diversity, participation and having fun. She said it is also historically interesting and educational.

"We have a good reputation locally in learning and having fun while you're doing it," Hays said.

Hays said her persona is a lay nun who is half-Welsh, half-Norman and lived about 50 years after William the Conqueror reigned. Lay nuns would take care of local villagers but didn't take vows. Then, they were allowed more freedom to travel and, if they wanted, to marry. Hays said this character allows her a lot of flexibility because few women in that time period could travel.

Support the Cats, but show KU fans what class really means

Rock chalk, chicken hawk, K-who?

Repeat this chant three times loudly whenever Jayhawk fans chant their version at Saturday's Sunflower Showdown. But do it nicely.

You see, the Hawk fans and players haven't talked to Texas A&M fans about the Aggies' good game-day experience in Manhattan.

Especially Kansas coach Terry Allen.

Allen told The Wichita Eagle on Thursday, "I hear K-State fans are loud, obnoxious and do mean things to opposing players."

Did Allen say K-State fans?

Well, he can be forgiven. Allen, in his first year as the Hawks' head coach, hasn't played at KSU Stadium since 1989, when he was head coach at Northern Iowa.

Allen went on to say, "I've heard they're worse than Nebraska."

Seeing as how Nebraska's Memorial Stadium seats 72,700 people, K-State fans being louder than the third-largest city in Nebraska can be taken as a compliment.

Allen finished with, "We'll have to do well early and take the crowd out of it."

Not possible.

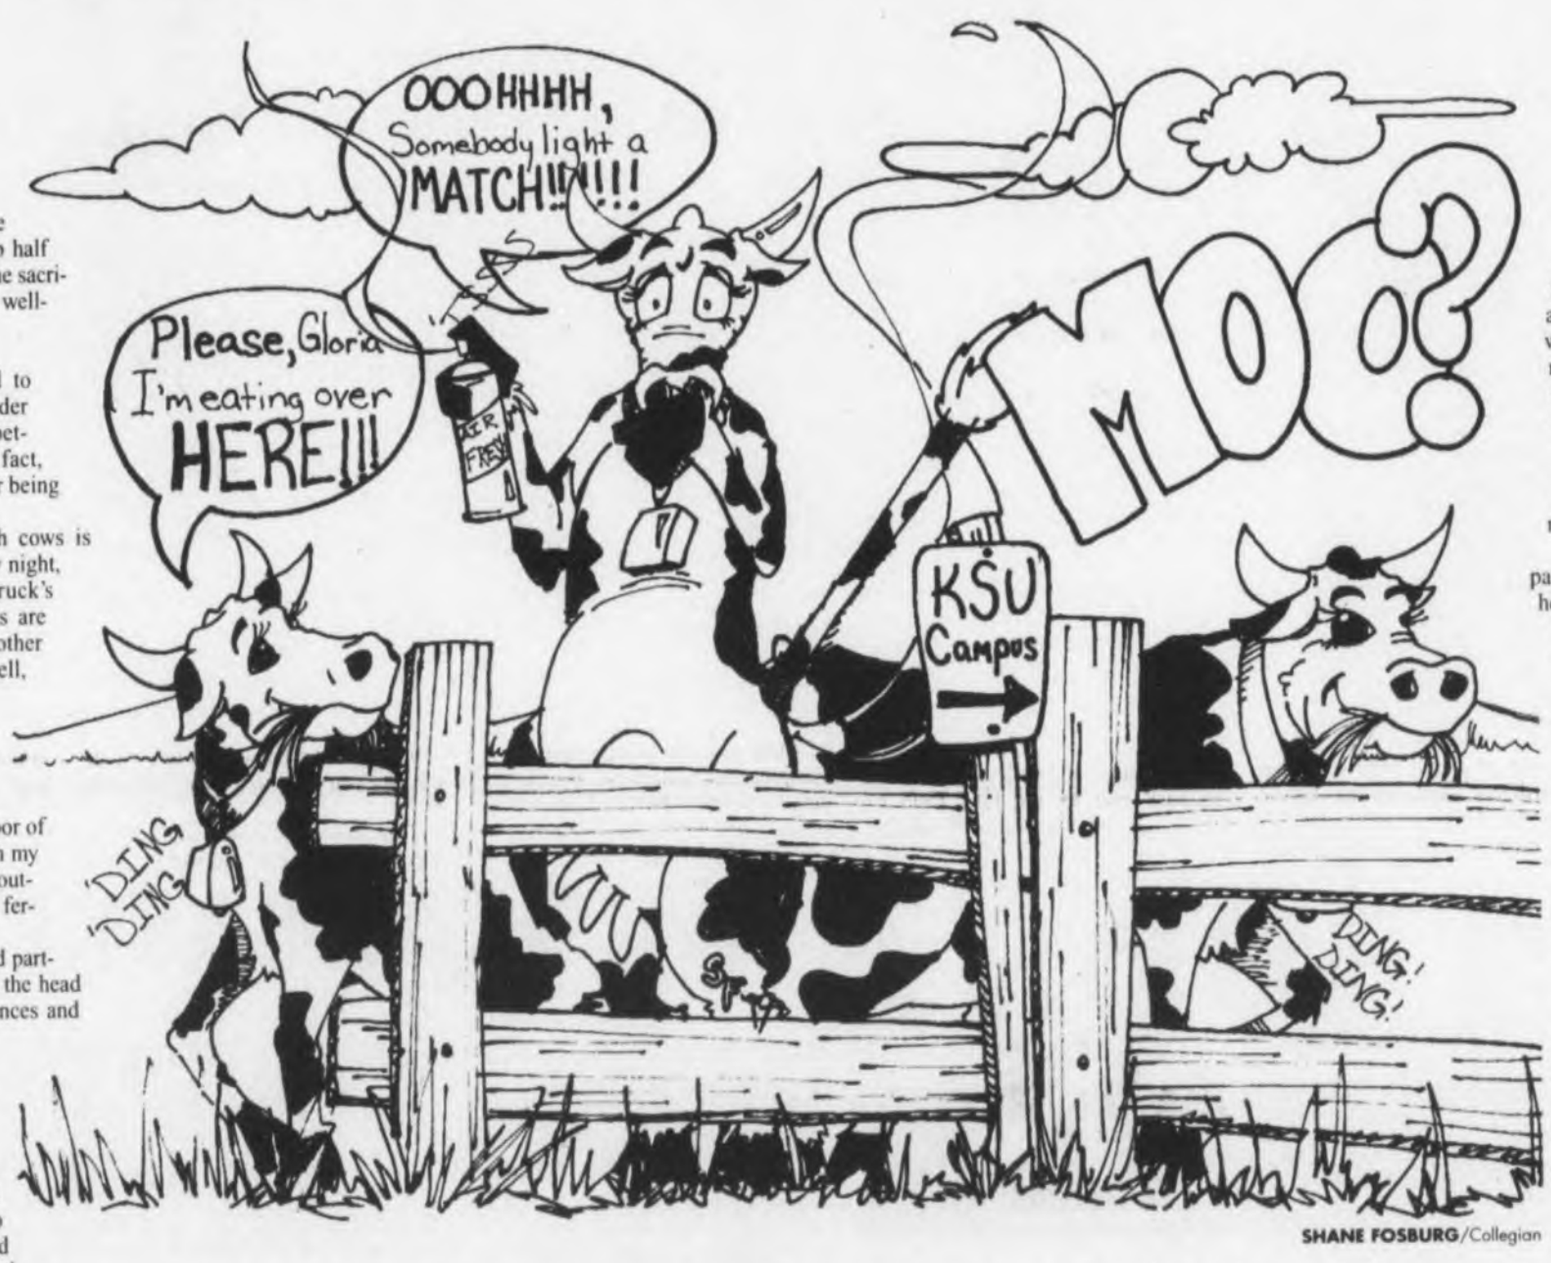
First off, whether KU fans think this rivalry is important is beside the point. For many K-State fans, the KU game is the most anticipated, talked-about game of the season.

Hawk fans say Missouri is the rival school now. It's interesting that has happened since KU and Mizzou's football programs are more like KU and K-State were years ago, when the game was anybody's game.

Secondly, whether KU fans think this game is important is irrelevant. KU players want to go to a bowl game, and they need one more win to get there. If you ask the players, no doubt they'd talk your ear off about how important it is.

Lastly, the crowd at the A&M game was louder than any game most students could remember. This game has as much importance, so be as loud or louder — with Wildcat class and decorum.

Sure, the Cats could lose. But it's doubtful.



If they did, we'd be upset, but we'd love them anyway.

It's doubtful KU fans would say the same thing.

Smells like K-State
Agricultural universities have their disadvantages

SHANE FOSBURG/Collegian

I hate cows.

Make no mistake, I admire the animals for making up half of the four food groups. The sacrifice they make for the well-being of humans is honorable.

But they are just so stupid.

For those who have ever tried to interact with cows, there is no sadder sight. They don't respond well to petting, riding or conversation. In fact, they have little true value except for being dinner.

However, my biggest beef with cows is their smell. On my way home every night, cow smells seep through my truck's vents. Suffice it to say, the smells are reminiscent of farms, zoos and other places where animals are free to, well, you know.

I wish I could say the smell only presented itself at night while I was driving home. Unfortunately, the wind perfectly blows the odors right to the front door of my apartment. After that, it stays on my clothes. So now I have to explain to out-of-town guests why I smell like, uh, fertilizer.

Partly because I was curious and partly because I was angry, I e-mailed the head of the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry to ask him what exactly I was smelling.

The reply I received was quite pleasant, and he seemed to be concerned about the situation. It said the smell was coming from the teaching and research centers north of Marlatt Avenue. It also said animal-related odors could only be detected in the limited instances where air is heavy, such as during darkness, and when the wind is from the north.

The e-mail was kindly worded and seemed sincere, so it made me feel a little better. However, it did neglect to name exactly which animals were creating the smell. After all, my apartment is also near a sheep pasture, so it could be them stinking up my air.

But I had a hunch the smell was in fact coming from much larger, much uglier animals.

My depth of knowledge about the agricultural industry — including cattle — is weak at best. I've never lived on or near a farm. None of my relatives are really involved in agriculture. So I have a limited, if not biased, point of view when it comes to cows.

In fact, most of my interactions with cattle involve some sort of cruelty. I've been "cow-tipping," although it didn't really work. Most of the cows woke up before my friends and I had a chance to make them fall over. For as dumb as cows are, they still get pretty angry when you sneak up on them in the middle of the night. Many would chase us away, although some would just look at us with that stupid, glazed-over expression on their faces. But probably the cruelest of my pranks was when I tried to feed a cow a hamburger from McDonald's. The beast refused to eat it, although I think it was because it didn't want to eat the hamburger out of my hand — not because it was related to it. It just looked blankly at me and uttered its most unintelligent "Moo."

Of all the stupid sounds nature has ever produced, the "moo" is probably in the top five. I have little respect for animals that can't even communicate with some sort of inflection. Smart animals have expression in their voices. Smart animals talk with multiple syllables. Cows, on the other hand, just moan.

I drive by cow pastures and look at herds doing absolutely nothing but just standing around.

Sometimes cows will even make themselves look more stupid by chewing their cud. What really upsets me is that cows have no nobility. They aren't strong and proud like horses. They can't be companions like dogs. They're not curious and prissy like cats. To my limited, egotistical point of view, the only thing cows are good for is eating and wearing.

Some would find it ironic that I, the ultimate of all cow haters, would be attending a university that bases much of its tradition on agriculture. But actually, my only squabble with the entire industry completely lies on the repugnancy of cows.

I like attending an agricultural university because I can park my truck without feeling out of place. I also like being able to listen to country music without being shunned. The only thing that would make the agricultural aspect of K-State better would be if the wind would blow the other way.

But because that's not going to happen, I get to use the most stupid of all creatures as a scapegoat for my worries.

Cubus bovum.

Scampering through the steamy Manhattan streets

I guess I'm what one could call a masochist.

It's not as if I regularly attach assorted clamps to my nipples while I get topographical maps of industrialized nations tattooed on sensitive body parts. I'm real wimpy when it comes to stuff like that.

What I do for pain is fairly mainstream. It even has a couple of magazines devoted to it, available for purchase right next to Boys' Life and Ranger Rick at the local grocery store.

I run. Or, in more honest terms, I scamper.

I did the old cross country thing in high school for three years, never having tasted the sweetness of success — that same success I'd been reminded on several occasions I would never have. It's not like I stayed out to show them I was a-gonna be somebody someday. And it's not like I stayed out because I enjoyed the bitter sting of being the only senior on the junior varsity squad. And contrary to that obnoxious [illegible], I didn't stay out because of the glory.

Truth be known, I only stayed out to see if I could get my body-fat percentage below 2 percent, because you just can't imagine how many benefits there are to not being able to float.

For some reason, I continued scampering once I came to K-State. In fact, one of my earliest memories of my collegiate running career goes way back to fall 1996.

There I was, trotting along, minding my own business as I waited for a stoplight to turn green. Then all of a sudden, I was surrounded by all these waify people. When the light turned green, I scooted along, realizing soon afterward I was in the middle of the K-State cross country team (or harriers, as they're called in the business).

After my broken bones mended and my nose stopped bleeding, I decided to stop looking so professional when I ran. But that's another story, and it involves state representative and harrier-extraordinare Jim Ryun, so we won't go into that here.

It was time last weekend. Time for me to test my strength, my endurance, my perseverance in a Two-Day Battle Royale. Preparation for the event on Friday night included working at Dillons while wearing a monkey face and seeing the non-running related film, "Boogie Nights."

I was ready.

Saturday morning brought with it the Kappa Alpha Theta Wildkat Chase. Five or 10 kilometers — choose your own pain.

That's right — I went full throttle at 10K, baby.

And let me say my poor running partner, Chris, probably had a harder time than I did that morning. Not because he just sits on his butt all week, pretending that reading Runners' World magazine is the same as running, then expecting to be able to run 6.2 miles on Saturday. The guy runs marathons. It's just that I'm absolutely unbearable to run with.

"Chris, kick that girl in the tendon," I'd command.

"Ha ha. What a funny joke. You make me laugh. Ha ha," he'd say.

"No, seriously, kick her in the tendon. Then we can pass her. Maybe I can swipe her inhaler," I'd assert.

"You know Brandi, if you'd just run during the week instead of just reading Runners' World, you'd ..."

"Damn it, I'll just do it myself."

By this time the girl is eying me suspiciously, her hand on her numb-chucks (running is very combative, by the way).

Anyway, we finished, and not last, I might add. We soundly beat that 8-year-old girl by at least three minutes. So there.

Stage one completed. Now we enter end game.

I was a bit concerned on Sunday morning when I woke up paralyzed from the waist down. Stage two of the Two-Day Battle Royale was participation in the intramural cross country meet. Two miles, Warner Park style. I stretched and grunted a lot.

Then I was ready.

The girls' race included some bananas and a girl in a skirt, not to mention hurricane-force winds. But I like a challenge. The race began. A banana and several other girls passed me right way. The skirt-girl soon followed. I was left alone with my thoughts.

After the first mile, this nice young man read me my time. I quickly informed him it was, indeed, the time of a champion. Yes, indeed, he concurred.

KRIS EMMONS/Collegian

I finally finished, again not last. I beat a banana and the girl who had just had several big, important organs removed, thank you. It was the epitome of triumph, having recorded what was perhaps my worst two-mile time to date.

But I am, as they say in the Special Olympics, a winner. There's nothing in the world like asthma attacks, side cramps and toenail loss. (And I do mean toenail loss. Stop by sometime, and I'll give you a gander.)

If you see me trotting about in your neck of the woods, or if you see me convulsing on the ground, please act like you don't notice. Just politely step over me. And, if you're going to kick me, please stay away from my kidneys.

Movie might be lead horse in Oscar race

Movie Review

So goes the mantra of Eddie Adams, played by Mark Wahlberg in "Boogie Nights."

Everybody's given one special gift, he's told himself. But what could Eddie, a high school dropout who buses tables at a night club, have to offer the world in 1978?

Eddie's key to fame is positioned between his legs. And his stardom arrives by the name Dirk Diggler on the tarnished silver screen of pornography.

From the beginning, the surreality of the late '70s club scene combines with the realization that this little enclave of American society hasn't been examined to any great degree. It ranges from giddy to demented and disjointed fun.

It gets better. Once the audience is led past Dirk's encounter with porn director Jack Horner (Burt Reynolds), and Jack's comment there is something wonderful in Dirk's jeans just waiting to get out, the story emerges instead.

It's not just about porn, and it's not just about Dirk. With Julianne Moore of "The Myth of Fingerprints" and "Nine Months," Academy Award nominee William H. Macy of "Fargo" and Don Cheadle of "Rosewood" and TV's "Picket Fences," the cast easily ranks as this year's most eclectic and interesting.

Wahlberg, whose film credits include "Renaissance Man" and "Fear," quickly transforms his character from an idealist who wants to improve the sex lives of millions to a cocaine-addled high roller who gets too big for his britches and finally comes full circle.

Jack Horner is another dream role, and Reynolds plays him well as a father figure to the motley bunch who put the sex scenes in the theaters and the videotapes on the shelves. It's enough to forget "Evening Shade."

Up-and-coming director P.T. Anderson better have his Oscar speech ready. What could easily have bombed as a cheap-thrills flick is a thrilling exposé of the glitz and excess of Los Angeles at the turn of the decade, and a welcome peek into the lives and times of some very endearing characters.

"Boogie Nights" is showing at Westloop 6 Theatres in Manhattan. It's rated R for violence, language and sexual material.

Provost preaches planning, problem solving

MATT KREPS
staff writer

Stepping into James Coffman's office is like walking into the Old West. Pictures of cowboys and horses hang on the walls. The conservative, but plush, nature of the wood-paneled office demands respect for an era long past.

However, there is little student traffic into the Provost's Office. It is one of the quieter offices on campus, but it is one where important decisions are made. Coffman is directly involved in deciding what happens at K-State.

"It's not the equivalent of a provost marshal," Coffman said. "It doesn't mean 'jailer.'"

What provost does mean is coordination. K-State's nine colleges, the Graduate School, the Division of Continuing Education and Hale Library provide an array of services to students. The Provost's Office oversees those activities to maximize their effectiveness.

The organizational flow chart for the university lists more than 150 different deans, department heads and other offices directly under the Provost. Coffman is responsible for all of their efforts.

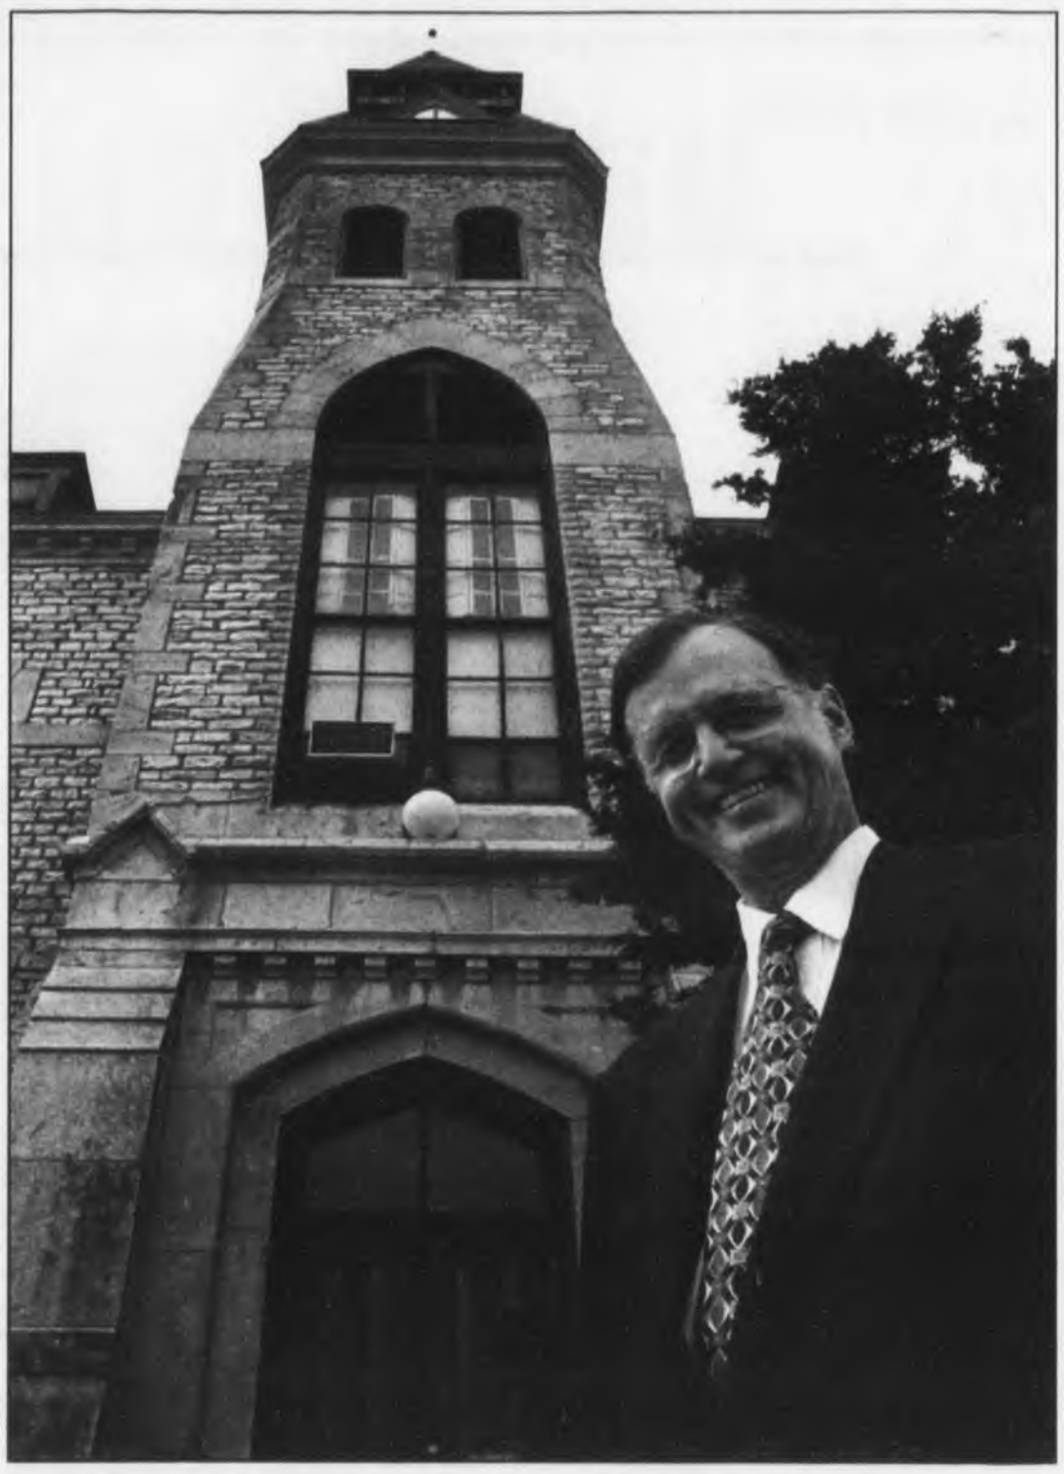
"We do a lot of planning and problem solving," Coffman said.

One of the projects the Provost's Office has worked on recently includes changing the faculty incentives and rewards program from numerical rankings to individualized goals and rewards.

The office also coordinates hiring new employees and recently added two new advisers to the College of Arts and Sciences to meet student demand.

Hiring has been frozen for the next two years to help redirect money into technology enhancements for classrooms and teaching labs, Coffman said.

Some projects include developing a user-friendly information system on the Internet for student use, improving adviser feedback to make the program better and developing a new method of evaluating graduate teaching assistants.



"That's a large project that I think is just going to be tremendous for undergraduates and the GTAs themselves," Coffman said.

The new evaluation is done earlier and looks at more than just teaching. The university found that many problems were not with language barriers, but with the classrooms or the teaching style. Simple changes improved students' experiences in the classroom, Coffman said.

Other projects include the library task force, graduate program reviews, intellectual property policies concerning patents and copyrights on work done at K-State and the Task Force on Gender Issues.

In the next six months, the Provost's Office will implement a systemwide review process, conduct two dean searches and continue a series of lectures on management topics for department heads. There will be more to come that Coffman could not predict.

"At least half of what we'll be doing we can't foresee at this point," he said.

JAMES COFFMAN serves as provost for K-State. K-State's nine colleges, the Graduate School, the Division of Continuing Education and Hale Library provide an array of services to students, which the Provost's Office oversees.

Artifacts, jewelry to be sold this weekend at antique show

KRISTIN BOYD
staff reporter

An array of exotic items including Indian artifacts, European art, crystal and jewelry will be a part of Manhattan's largest antique show and sale this weekend.

The 10th Annual Antique and Collectible Show and Sale will take place from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. Saturday and 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. on Sunday. The show will be at Pottorf Hall in CiCo Park.

The antique and collectible show is run each year by the Pilot Club of Manhattan, an international service club.

"This is a large fund raiser for our Manhattan's Pilot Club. All the money we make is put back into the community," Barbara Stewart, coordinator of this year's show, said.

Norma Nordgren, co-coordinator for the show, said the money raised helps with programs such as the crisis center, Sunset Zoological Park and area nursing homes.

"We hope that having a big flux of people in for the football game will help us," Nordgren said.

Antique dealers from Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, Iowa, Idaho and Missouri will participate in the show.

"We have the hall jammed with antiques. We have a waiting list of dealers who just want to get in," Nordgren said.

The antique show will feature Victorian items, oak and walnut furniture, coins, dolls, toys, old trunks and much more.

"The nice thing is that we have rather inexpensive items to rather costly items such as furniture. It is especially nice because there will be a guy who repairs just nicks out of crystal there," Nordgren said.

The Pilot Club members will serve lunch on both days from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. Tickets are sold on both days for $2.50.

"I encourage everyone to come see this year's show because there is a treasure there for everybody," Stewart said.

Goal posts need to stay upright after easy win

It's time for the Sunflower Showdown.

We all know that. We all know the Wildcats will devour the Jayhawks on Saturday. Back when both teams were terrible, this game was likely one team's only win of the season. That is the case no more.

K-State's football program has rebounded to the point where many Cat fans are talking Fiesta Bowl, and KU is now consistently respectable. K-State is the better team and has the better program, but KU did win the 1995 Aloha Bowl.

But we must bask in the glory of football season now, because roundball season is just around the corner, and that's when we must stop talking. Wildcat carcasses will be hanging from the rafters of Allen Fieldhouse.

So, the Cats are playing a respectable team at home Saturday. They're not playing the No. 1 team in the country, or even a team that will likely make it to a bowl game.

That makes Saturday's game, even if it's the team from up the road, just another game the Cats should win. The Cats have beaten three potential bowl teams this season (four if Ohio makes it), but life went on as if the wins were expected, as they should have been.

VIEWPOINT

DAN MERKER

DAN MERKER is a senior in computer science. You can send your e-mail comments to Dan at dmerker@ksu.edu.

Two years ago, the Jayhawks came into Manhattan ranked in the top 10, but the Cats were still the better team, and they trashed the Hawks 41-7. Granted, I was a naive freshman, but I couldn't believe the fans tore down the goal posts. It's hardly a big win for the program when it beats a team that's considerably worse.

The tumbling of goal posts is a wonderful tradition in college football when a team, against all odds, somehow beats a team it had no business beating or has some sort of milestone win. This tradition is to be used sparingly, though, for many reasons.

First of all, tearing down the goal posts after every win would ruin it. It would become boring and routine, and ruin the special occasion it is after the euphoria of a great win.

Secondly, we pay for them. They're not like a hockey net that is meant to break away from the ice and can be replaced immediately. They're bigger, and they break. Goal posts are things you can't just fish out of Aggieville and put back with no trouble. Nor are they cheap.

Third, it's KU. The Cats beat KU every year. What's the big deal now? The Jayhawks aren't nearly as good as Texas A&M, who the Cats beat. If the Aggies are a better team, shouldn't that game have been the downfall of the goal posts? How about Ohio?

Finally, KSU Stadium will badly need those goal posts seven days later. How embarrassing would it be for Colorado to come down for the football game, just to find a 120-by-50-yard painted piece of artificial turf without the tall yellow fork-looking things at the ends.

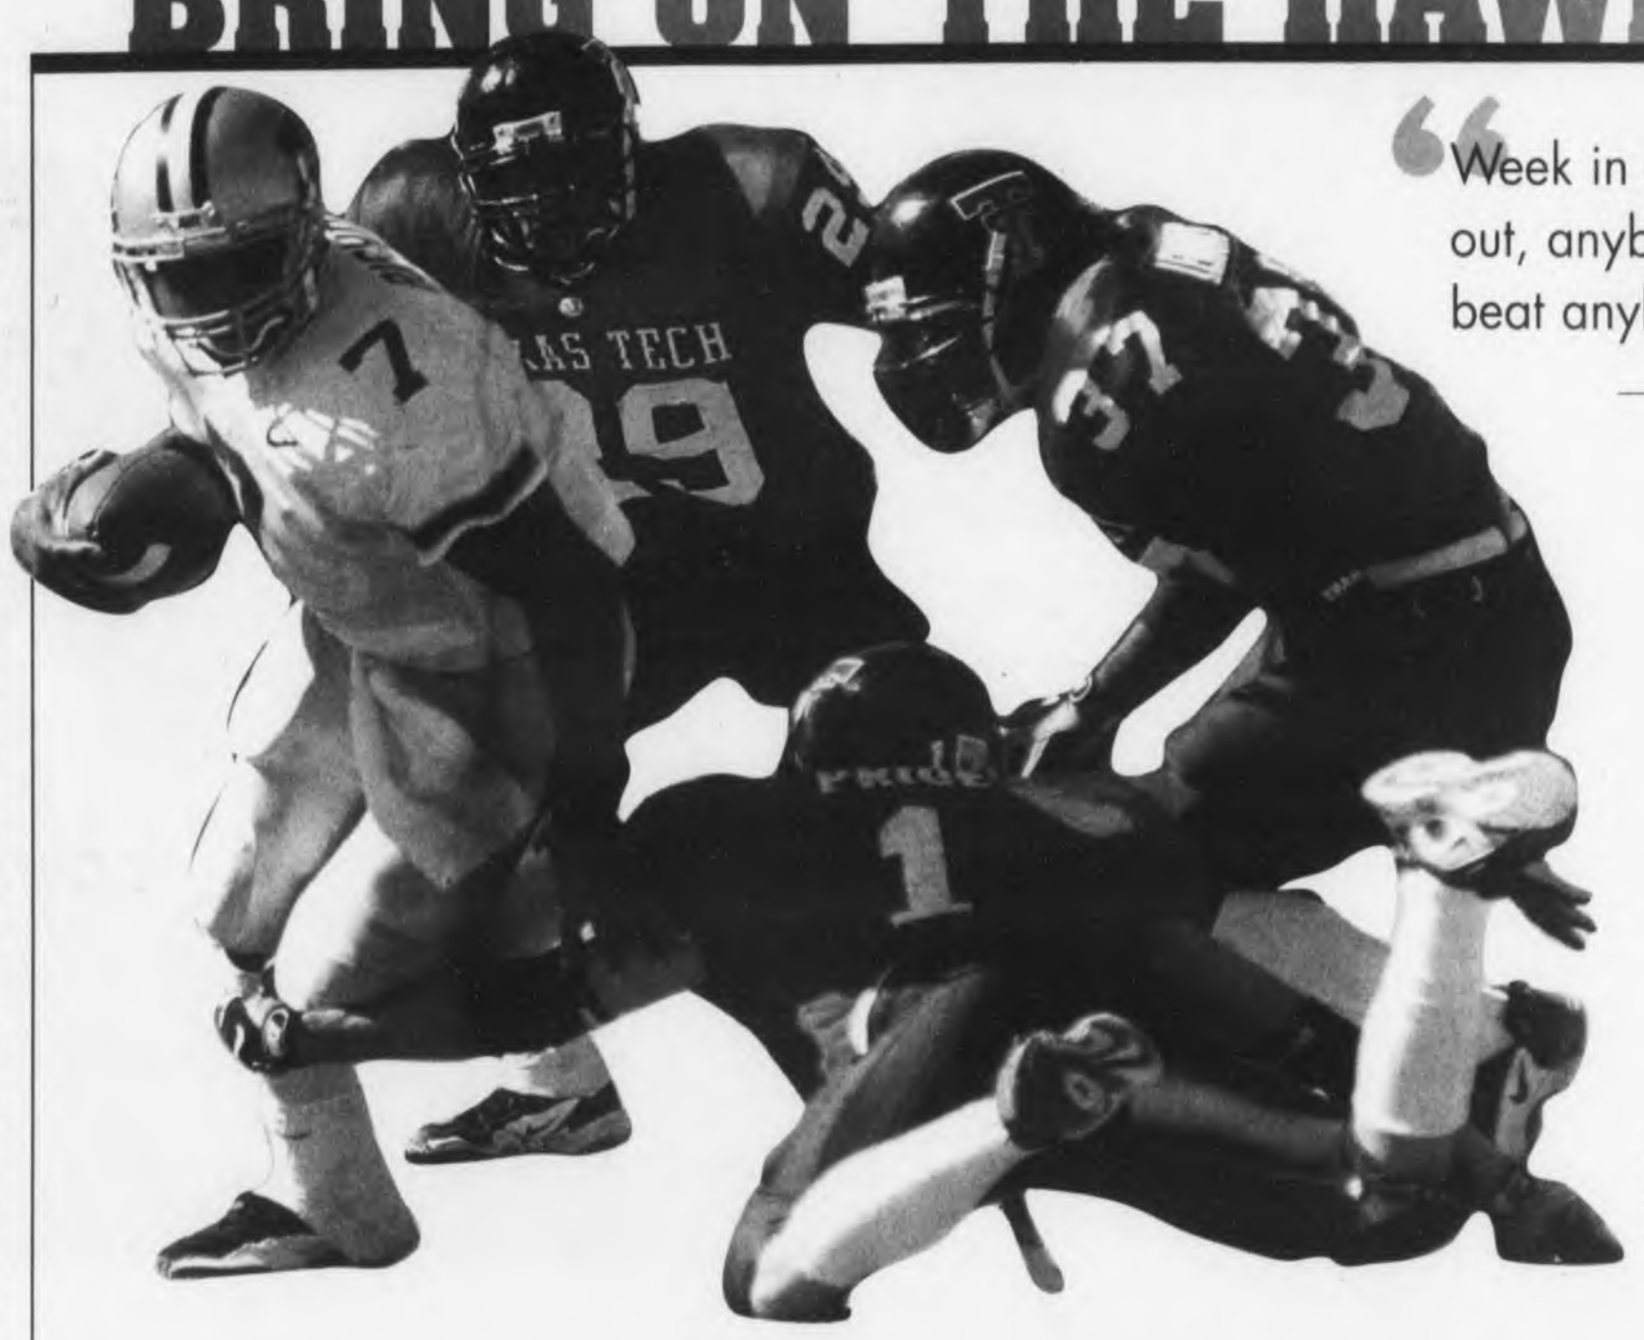
What I'm saying here is that K-State is legitimately one of the top programs in the country, and it's time we, as fans, start to act like it.

We're past the stage of tearing down the goal posts against a 5-4 team, regardless of who it is.

Beating the Hawks should be as ordinary as whooping up on Missouri or Iowa State annually. It's a business-like dispatching. Just put cement shoes on them and drop them in the lake. Nothing more extravagant than taking care of the business at hand.

Just because they are the other big state university, and just because whenever you tell anyone from out-of-state you go to K-State and get the typical response, "Oh, you're a Jayhawk?" doesn't mean this win is any more important than any other this year.

I always figured that when the Cats beat Colorado, the posts would tumble like Fulton County Stadium, but that shouldn't even be the case this year. The Cats are better than the Buffaloes, and it'll be another sound beating of a 5-4 team, that's all. The Buffs won't even go to a bowl, barring an unforeseen upset.



The party will have to wait, though. Neither team is worth getting arrested over, nor is it worth the effort.

It's a long walk to Aggieville, and the posts aren't feathers.

I do think this ritual has its place, though. If the Cats beat the hated Cornhuskers next season, not only will I encourage the upending of the goal posts, but there's at least a 50-50 chance I will be the idiot riding on top of them like they're a mechanical bull (but I won't be wearing spurs).

On Saturday, keep in mind what tearing down the goal posts is all about. After all, it's just KU, and they're not sponge-worthy.

BRING ON THE HAWKS

MICHAEL BISHOP SCRAMBLES AWAY FROM TEXAS TECH DEFENDERS IN K-STATE'S 13-2 WIN.

Kansas, K-State ready for annual Sunflower Showdown

When Kansas (5-4, 3-3) comes to Manhattan on Saturday to play K-State (7-1, 4-1) in the 95th Sunflower Showdown, the Jayhawks will try to keep things the way they've always been.

That is, as they've almost always been.

Kansas has a 61-28-5 lead in the all-time series but has had trouble with the Wildcats in recent years.

"Kansas has won most of the ball games in the history of the rivalry. We're well behind in that category. There have been a lot of good games, a lot of close games. There's been a lot of excitement," K-State Coach Bill Snyder said.

The Hawks will make attempt No. 5 at win 62, having lost four consecutive games to the Cats.

They haven't won in Manhattan since 1989.

None of the Hawks — including seniors who redshirted and have been around for five years — have ever seen Kansas beat the Wildcats.

And the Hawks are expected to lose by more than three touchdowns.

Kansas ranks second-to-last in the Big 12 in passing offense and ranks last in rushing offense, total offense and scoring offense. The Hawks' offense also ranks near the bottom of the charts in all of Division I-A.

But don't expect them to be overlooked by the Cats.

"I don't think Kansas has the most ineffective offense in the country," Snyder said. "If you're ineffective on either side of the ball, you're not gonna win five ballgames, five out of nine. It's just not gonna happen. They have done what they needed to do in order to win ballgames. I don't see that as being ineffective."

Although the Hawks haven't put up big numbers moving the ball, the defense has kept them in games this season. Kansas' defense ranks sixth in the conference, compared with its No. 10 finish last season.

The Hawks are also one win away from qualifying for a bowl game.

Offensively, the team is led by senior running back Eric Vann. Vann has gained 731 yards on the ground this season, averaging 4.2 yards per carry. He's also the Hawks' second-leading receiver.

"I think not just this year, but in past years, he's managed some pretty good numbers," Snyder said. "He's done a nice job for them. He fits in not just as a running back, but as a receiver."

The Hawks' offensive line is a little smaller

Netters ready for Sooners

DAN MERKER
assistant sports editor

Fresh off its narrow victory over Kansas, the K-State volleyball team will return to action at 7 tonight against the Oklahoma Sooners at Ahearn Field House.

The Wildcats are looking for revenge after the Sooners took a narrow 3-2 decision Oct. 4 in Norman. The match was closely contested, with Oklahoma winning the final game 15-13. Only one of the five games was won by more than three points.

"At times, we played very good volleyball," Coach Jim McLaughlin said. "We just couldn't sustain it. It's not good enough to get ahead. We have to finish games."

At the time, it dropped the Cats to 1-3 in Big 12 Conference play. Since then, K-State has won eight of nine conference matches to improve its record to 9-4, just half a game out of second place.

K-State won both matches from Oklahoma in 1996 for the first time ever. The Sooners went 8-12 in the conference a year ago but already have seven conference wins in 12 games. OU is in sixth place in the conference, but a win would pull the Sooners to within one-half game of K-State.

Oklahoma is coming off two straight 3-0 losses, both on the road, to No. 22 Colorado and No. 13 Nebraska. Before that, they won seven of eight conference matches, including a 3-0 sweep of then-No. 5 Nebraska, a team K-State has never beaten.

K-State is coming off a 3-2 win against intrastate rival Kansas. The Cats beat KU 15-13 in the fifth game to complete a sweep of the Jayhawks this season.

Middle blocker Heather Haff said the Cats didn't look past KU, who is now 1-12 in Big 12 play, to their opportunity to get revenge on the Sooners.

"We weren't really thinking about Oklahoma at all," Haff said.

"That's definitely a game we want to win, but right now we were concentrating on KU."

Now the Cats can concentrate on Oklahoma.

The Sooners have several players among the statistical leaders in the Big 12.

Outside hitter Patrice Arrington leads the conference with 5.24 kills per game. Setter Meredith Van Horn is tops with 14.76 assists, and middle blocker Sonny Spoonland is second with a .363 hitting percentage.

The Cats are looking to maintain their momentum. They have won three straight matches, and after the Sooners leave town, K-State travels for four consecutive road games. Over the next two weeks, the Cats travel to No. 13 Nebraska, No. 22 Colorado, No. 8 Texas and No. 14 Texas A&M. Of those teams, Texas A&M is the only one the Cats beat the first time around.

The Cats will gun for their 10th conference win against the Sooners at 7 p.m. Admission is free with a student ID, and the game will be broadcast on KSDB-91.9 FM.

Asbury looking for answers in team's exhibition opener

JOEL WHITE
staff writer

Men's basketball coach Tom Asbury expects to have questions about his team answered before and after tonight's exhibition game against the NBC Thunder.

The main question is about the Wildcats' backcourt dilemma. Will freshman guard Adam Lopez redshirt this season, or will he play?

Asbury said whether Lopez will redshirt will be decided before tonight's game.

"If he plays, it's final," Asbury said. "If he doesn't play, it's not necessarily final, although given the criteria under which we attack our exhibition games, if we're going to play him, we'll play him in that game. Adam will ultimately make this decision."

Regardless of the decision, Asbury said he is excited about Lopez's future as a Wildcat.

"Adam is good. Adam will be a damn good player here. It's just a matter of this year, next year or whenever," he said.

Even if Lopez, last year's USA Today Player of the Year in Arizona, is redshirted, the Cats figure to receive good backcourt play from Duane Davis, Chris Griffin and Aaron Swartzendruber.

With the exception of Davis, a true point guard, Asbury said the team's guard positions will be filled by versatile players.

"Duane is a point guard. Chris is a combo, he can play the point. Aaron is a combo, he can play the point," he said.

Last year's Cats were ranked eighth in both team defense and rebound margin and in the Big 12. Asbury said questions remain about this year's front-court defense and rebounding.

"I think we're maybe a little deeper in some spots, maybe a little quicker," he said. "I don't know that we're as good defensively or on the boards. That will remain to be seen."

Although Asbury has questions about the team's overall defense, he said the backcourt defense should be a strength for the team.

"We can defend guards in the backcourt," he said. "Griffin, Duane and Aaron can really defend people."

With a number of combinations possible for a starting five, Asbury said post player Shawn Rhodes and forwards Manny Dies and Ayome May are the only three who have secured a starting role for the Western

Brewers turn National

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MILWAUKEE — For the Milwaukee Brewers, switching to the National League is like coming home, Bud Selig said Thursday.

There is "sadness over the prospect of ending a 28-year relationship with the American League and its member clubs, and anticipation over returning Milwaukee to its roots in the National League," said Selig, baseball's acting commissioner and the Brewers' controlling owner.

Milwaukee, the home of the NL's Braves from 1953-65, leaves the AL Central to play in a six-team NL Central. The switch, approved Wednesday by the ruling executive council, is the first in the major leagues since the 1892 season and leaves the NL with 16 teams and the AL with 14.

The league switch marks the first for a Major League Baseball team since the American Association folded on Dec. 17, 1891, and the NL agreed to absorb the St. Louis franchise and three teams that later folded — Baltimore, Louisville and Washington.

"Those of us old enough remember the glory days of Aaron, Mathews and Logan, and Spahn and Burdette, review this as coming home," Selig said.

Selig, who gathered baseball's top executives and even his two young granddaughters for Thursday's news conference, told of listening on the radio to the end of a Cubs-Brewers game he couldn't attend in person.

"It was so exciting at the end," he said. "I'm sitting all alone, and I can still remember, it's two outs, nobody on, Sammy Sosa hitting, a ball and two strikes, Doug Jones pitching.

"You can't hear (Brewers announcer Bob) Uecker because the noise and the crowd was so deafening … and he struck him out and the place went wild. And I knew then that interleague play was going to work."

The Brewers' move, he predicted, will be the wave of the future in baseball as realignment proceeds in coming years.

Boston Red Sox chief executive officer John Harrington, chairman of baseball's Realignment Committee, described the tedious process of working out a new league setup to accommodate two expansion teams.

Polling found that 75 percent of fans in Milwaukee favored realignment. Selig, criticized by some owners for having his own team be the one to switch leagues, said public support was an important factor in the decision.

While Milwaukee has been an American League town since the Seattle Pilots moved there on April 1, 1970, and became the Brewers, the NL's Braves moved from Boston to Milwaukee on March 18, 1953, in baseball's first franchise shift since 1903.

But the Braves, who won the World Series in 1957 and an NL pennant the following year, were given approval by the NL on Nov. 7, 1964, to move to Atlanta for the 1966 season.

The original Milwaukee Brewers played in the American League in 1901, finishing last at 48-89, then became the St. Louis Browns that Dec. 3 and transformed into the Baltimore Orioles on Sept. 29, 1953.

As part of the realignment, the expansion Tampa Bay Devil Rays will join the AL East, the Detroit Tigers will shift to the AL Central. The expansion Arizona Diamondbacks will join the NL West. The NL Central will become baseball's largest division with six teams.

Regatta season ends with intrastate rivalry

MICHAEL RYAN
staff reporter

Before the Wildcats and Jayhawks do battle Saturday on Wagner Field, they will be rowing against each other in the fall season's final regatta.

The K-State women's crew will compete against the Jayhawks in a dual meet Saturday morning at Tuttle Creek Reservoir. The first race will start at 9 a.m., and the last race will start at 10:30 a.m.

This is the first year for this meet, but the schools hope to make it a tradition. They plan to compete each year in the same place as the football game.

"There's a healthy rivalry between the two schools," Jenny Hale, women's crew coach, said. "It's not taken lightly."

The meet will consist of seven dual races run in 15-minute intervals. Each race is 2,000 meters with the crews racing side-by-side.

The last race of the day will feature the first varsity eight from each school, which is the best each team has to offer. Earlier this year, the Cats' top boat finished ahead of Kansas' at the Head of the Charles competition by more than 13 seconds.

This event will also be the first action of the year for the novice teams because of a weather cancellation Oct. 26 at the Head of the Iowa.

"That would have been the novices' first race. So it's good we have this race happening," Hale said. "They're pretty excited about it."

Hale said the event will give parents and alumni of both schools a great opportunity to see the crews in action. The parents are planning a breakfast in the boathouse for the 120 to 130 athletes after the competition.

Going into the final meet of the fall, Hale said she has been happy with the fall season so far.

"Considering it's the third semester of rowing for these athletes, I was very pleased with the Head of the Charles," she said.

Carolina game on Nov. 14.

Asbury said he plans to take a different approach to the line-up and substitutions for tonight's game than he would for a regular-season game.

"We will almost platoon so we can get a pretty even distribution of minutes," he said. "That way I can get a good fair look at everybody."

Because he plans to use the platooning system, Asbury said the starting five tonight will not necessarily be the starting five against Western Carolina.

Tonight's opponent, Northwest Basketball Camp Thunder, which is a Division I college exhibition team, is 1-1 on the season with an 83-61 win over Eastern Washington and a 77-72 loss to Washington State.

Asbury said he is not overly concerned with winning tonight's game.

"We kind of turn off the scoreboard in that situation," he said. "Any time we take the floor we like to win, but I think it's more important that we get our priorities straight because the (exhibition) games don't count."

Asbury said tonight's game and Monday's exhibition game against the California Stars will be pivotal in the preparations for Western Carolina.

"We're not really prepared to play somebody yet, but our first game is so close on the heels of these two exhibition games that we have to get as close as we can," he said.

than the 300-pound units the Cats have seen this year, averaging 6-foot-4, 288 pounds.

The Hawks run various offensive sets, but defensively, they primarily use a 3-4.

The defense, which is limiting opponents to 20.7 points a game, is anchored by outside linebackers Patrick Brown and Ron Warner.

Brown has 64 tackles, including three sacks and eight tackles for losses. Warner has 35 tackles, 12.5 sacks and 17.5 tackles for losses.

Saturday's game will be the first time new Hawks coach Terry Allen takes on the Cats while leading Kansas. However, it won't be the first time he's taken a team into Manhattan.

In 1989, his first season as the head coach of Northern Iowa, Allen earned his first win with a 10-8 victory over K-State.

Now, in his first season coaching a Division I team, he'll try to pull off another win and qualify for a bowl bid. And Snyder knows that even though the Cats are heavily favored, the win probably won't come easily.

"There is more parity now than there has been in the history of the game (college football), to a certain degree," Snyder said. "Consequently, week in and week out, anybody can beat anybody. You see it every weekend. Somebody that shouldn't be in the ballpark jumps up and beats somebody else."

Albert says lies dominated case

Albert

▸ BROADCASTER BREAKS SILENCE, accuses women of extortion.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Disgraced broadcaster Marv Albert, in his first interview since pleading guilty to assault in a lurid sex case, showed little remorse and said both his former lover and a second accuser were liars.

"What happened, what she did to me, is just unbelievable," Albert said in an interview with ABC's Barbara Walters to be broadcast Friday night.

The 56-year-old sportscaster cut short his trial two months ago, pleading guilty and receiving a year of probation. NBC fired him shortly after he made his plea.

A longtime lover, Vanessa Perhach, had accused Albert of biting her on the back more than a dozen times and forcing her to perform oral sex in a Virginia hotel room last February. She said he was angry when she wouldn't agree to bring in another man for three-way sex.

Transcripts of the interview with Walters were released Thursday. Albert said he never tried to force oral sex on Perhach and that she had asked him to bite her on the back.

Although Albert apologized in court for hurting Perhach, he told Walters that tape of Perhach talking to police that night was "an Academy Award performance."

"She was trying to extort me," he said. "I think she saw it as a last opportunity, that she may not see me anymore because I had indicated that I was about to get engaged to Heather (Faulkiner)."

Albert also called a complete fabrication of the accusation of another woman, Patricia Masten, who said Albert made a pass at her in a Dallas hotel room when he exposed himself and was wearing women's underwear.

"She told me she had a crush on me, and she wanted to have sex," he said. "I did not."

The woman, a hotel employee, said Albert lured her to his hotel room on a pretext, then bit and tried to force her to perform oral sex. She said she escaped by pulling off Albert's toupee. Albert said he had a hair stylist ready to testify he was wearing a hair weave that would not have pulled off.

The broadcaster admitted to engaging in three way sex once with Perhach and another woman, but said she accused him of getting angry the night of the biting incident because she needed a reason to explain why he snapped.

"She's dealing with a person who has never snapped," Albert said. "I mean, my personality is not to get angry."

Albert is undergoing therapy as part of the court-ordered probation and said he finds it extremely helpful in explaining why people are unfaithful. He did say he regretted being unfaithful to his then-wife in the past and to Faulkiner.

"You don't think that you need therapy because your sex life was kinky?" Walters asked.

"No, I really feel that's been overrated," Albert said.

Theater company brings entertainment to McCain with unusual format, style

JAMI NELSON
staff writer

The Fred Garbo Inflatable Theater Co. brings a new form of entertainment — inflatable human animation — to McCain Auditorium on Sunday.

The 3 p.m. performance incorporates giant, inflatable props and background music.

The only two humans performing are Fred Garbo, the creator of the Inflatable Theater, and Brazilian ballerina Daielma Santos.

In the performance, Garbo wears inflatable suits of different shapes, while juggling, dancing and tumbling across the stage. Santos uses her ballet to add grace and fantasy to Garbo's images.

Together, Garbo and Santos create a visual comedy with their illusionary art forms.

The two performers bring much experience to the Inflatable Theater.

Garbo began performing in 1974 when someone paid him to do card tricks.

He also was the action inside Barkley the Dog from "Sesame Street" and was the chief juggler in Broadway's "Barnum." Garbo tumbled with the New York Opera's "Turandot" and performed with Brazil's MOMIX dance company. Recently, he has pursued his interests in inventing inflatables.

In addition to Garbo's accomplishments, Santos offers experience from Sao Paulo's Opera Paulista Company and the Cisne-Negro Ballet Company. She serves as a guest artist with the Portland, Maine, Ballet Company.

In addition to their worldly personal experience, the Inflatable Theater has performed in such places as Morocco, Spain, Ireland, Hong Kong, the United States and Chile, to name just a few.

In the United States, it has performed at the Kennedy Center in Washington, D.C., and recently aired on "Late Night with David Letterman."

In its journey to K-State, the Inflatable Theater offers entertainment for all ages.

"It will appeal to children, and adults will get a kick out of it, too," Brooke Evans, McCain Ambassador and undecided sophomore, said. "Not too many events incorporate inflatable people. Bubble people, you gotta love that."

City manager sees potential for local economic growth

JEFF COOPER/Collegian

GARY GREER serves as the chief executive officer of Manhattan's city government. Greer's job entails the direction of 232 full-time and part-time employees, and he oversees a $48 million budget.

KRISTIN BOYD
staff writer

Every day, Gary Greer is forced to make important decisions that will affect Manhattan.

He serves as the chief executive officer of Manhattan's city government and is better known as Manhattan's city manager.

Greer's job entails the direction of 232 full-time and part-time employees and responsibility for a $48 million budget.

"Basically, I run the city. I am in charge of carrying and implementing all the policies for the city," Greer said.

Greer came to Manhattan in November 1995.

"I have really fallen in love with the city and the community. I really appreciate being able to be involved with the city and university. This is the best interaction around or that I've heard of," Greer said.

Before coming to Manhattan, Greer lived in Kearney, Neb., where he also served as city manager for six years and assistant city manager for two years.

"I guess you can say that my career has followed along with university cities," Greer said.

Greer attended undergraduate school at Park College where he received a degree in political science with an emphasis in public administration. He also attended graduate school at the University of Kansas where he received his master's degree in public administration.

Greer is married and has twin daughters and a son.

"I try to work hard every day to become a better city manager, father and husband," Greer said.

Greer has a number of goals he would like to see happen for the city of Manhattan.

"I would like to transform our organization to run more like a business, so that it will be more friendly to customers and the community," Greer said.

Greer would like to see the facilities upgraded.

"We've neglected a lot of the infrastructure of the city, and I would like to change that," Greer said.

Greer is involved in a number of activities outside of work. He is a Rotary International Member, and he serves as an elder for the First Presbyterian Church.

"I enjoy a lot of recreational sports activities. I have played softball for about 15 years, but I have now retired to golf," he said.

Greer said he's excited about what lies ahead for Manhattan.

"I see a bright future for the city in the industrial and business climate. There is potential for a lot of economic growth," Greer said.

His job as city manager involves working with many different people in city administration. One of those whom he works closely with is Ron Fehr, assistant city manager of Manhattan.

"It has been professionally rewarding to work for Gary Greer. It is nice to work with someone who is a very progressive individual and who is working hard to make the city more progressive and customer-friendly," Fehr said.

Lake's death toll could climb to 5

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BURLINGTON, Kan. — Divers and dogs trained to smell cadavers searched Wolf Creek Lake on Thursday for the bodies of two men missing since Sunday.

The men, presumed drowned, are the latest tragedy since the lake opened to the public a little more than a year ago. The latest accident has raised questions about the popular fishing spot.

The lake's water is used to help cool the nuclear reactor that sits at its shore. Fishing was prohibited in the first 11 years the plant was in operation to make sure there were enough predatory fish to eat smaller fish that might clog the plant's water intake system.

Shortly after the lake was first opened to fishing, Jeffrey Brooks and Randall Stotts, both 32 and from Topeka, and Anthony Buckley, 26, Ozawkie, were killed when their boat capsized on Dec. 15.

On Sunday, the gas can, minnow bucket and cooler of Myron Apps, 46, and Ronald Charles, 48, were found. The men and their boat were not.

Wildlife and emergency officials say Wolf Creek isn't any more dangerous than other lakes in the state, but its warm water from the nuclear power plant and restricted fishing means large fish that attract fishers from all over.

Last year, there were five drownings in Kansas, including the three men who drowned at Wolf Creek Lake. This year, there have been six drownings at Kansas lakes, not including the two men missing at Wolf Creek.

Brad Hageman, a conservation officer who often patrols the lake, said people might not be as careful on the lake because it has only been open to the public for a year. Sunday's wind gusts up to 50 mph produced swells up to 5 or 6 feet high.

"Anytime you have a new body of water, you have accidents like this," he said. "It's popular right now."

Although the lake has been closed to the public since Sunday's accident, a maximum of 50 boats are allowed on the lake when it is open to the public.

Mona Grimsley, a spokeswoman for the plant, said officials are undecided on whether to close or restrict access to the lake.

But customers at Strawn Lumber and Supply, which is near the lake, said Thursday that the lake should be closed when the weather becomes too windy.

"In two hours time, that water can go from smooth as glass to frightening," said Otis Jones, owner of the lumber store.

Sheriff Randy Rogers, standing Thursday next to the tent that served as rescue headquarters, said that's what happened Sunday when the two fishermen and their boat disappeared.

"The waves that day were 6 to 8 feet tall," he said. "It was like an ocean."

Labor leaders want food tax removed

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — State labor leaders called on Gov. Bill Graves on Thursday to recommend removing the state's 4.9-percent sales tax from food purchases.

Key members of the Legislature's two tax committees said the issue will be discussed in the 1998 session. But they cautioned that the cost in lost revenue — about $215 million a year — will be a problem and noted there will be pressure to reduce other taxes as well.

Rep. Phill Kline, R-Shawnee, chairman of the House Taxation Committee, was the most enthusiastic about it.

"We've got the money to do it," he said. "Certainly it is one of the biggest issues of fairness.

"The cost to government only emphasizes how important it would be to Kansas families to get to keep that money."

Three AFL-CIO officials told Graves in a letter they made public, "We suggest that the one thing which can be done that would benefit everyone in the state would be the removal of sales tax on food.

"Rich or poor, worker or businessman, we would all experience a decrease in our tax burden. The sales tax is the most regressive tax there is, and most especially when it is applied to food."

The letter was signed by Ron Eldridge, state AFL-CIO president; Wayne Maichel, executive vice president; and Jim DeHoff, secretary-treasurer.

Chairwoman Audrey Langworthy, R-Prairie Village, and Ranking Minority Member Janis Lee, D-Kensington, both of the Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee, agreed taking the sales tax off grocery store food purchases should be studied. But they were cautious about the proposal's viability.

"I'm sure the only way we could do it is with a phase-in, because there are so many other proposals from constituencies who will be pushing to reduce other taxes," Langworthy said.

"The question is: if you take it off food, then what tax relief do you not grant?" Lee said.

Lee said she believes there will be a push from Johnson and Wyandotte counties to remove or reduce the sales tax on food, because Missouri reduced its state sales tax on food to 1.225 percent from 4.225 percent as of Oct. 1.

But Langworthy said she hasn't heard of anybody who is "running over to Missouri to buy their food."

Thirty states have some form of sales-tax exemption on food.

"Nothing is off the table," Mike Matson, Graves' chief of communications, said. "There probably are dozens of tax-relief proposals that he will be considering. Cost is a concern, so phasing it in is probably an option."

Graves has said he plans to recommend at least $120 million worth of tax relief in the wake of burgeoning state revenues, but won't offer specifics until he reveals his legislative proposals when the session opens Jan. 12.

Classes help prepare couples for marriage

KRIS ROBL
staff reporter

St. Isidore's University Chapel is offering marriage preparation classes to all engaged couples.

Father Keith Weber, chaplain of St. Isidore's Catholic Church, said the goals of the classes are to educate and discuss the different aspects of marriage.

"We want to counsel couples and discuss the more important issues before they make a commitment," Weber said.

St. Isidore's offers two options for marriage preparation: a local or an alternative process. The local-preparation process involves meeting with an intern counselor to cover areas of finance, communication skills, family origin and issues of faith.

This process also includes attending a marriage-preparation weekend, a sacramental preparation class and one session on natural family planning.

The marriage-preparation weekend is designed to give couples the opportunity to think honestly and intensively in a face-to-face manner about a couple's prospective lives together.

The alternative-preparation process involves going to Wichita to participate in an engaged-encounter weekend, and attending a session on natural family planning.

Weber said these options are offered mainly for convenience. Some couples live in separate cities and cannot meet because of different locations.

"So far there have mostly been college students that attend these sessions," Kim O'Donnel, natural family practitioner, said.

O'Donnel said she had been teaching natural family planning for about a year and had recently counseled her 100th couple.

The marriage-preparation classes are open to all engaged couples.

For more information on marriage sessions or marriage-preparation weekends, call Father Keith Weber at 539-7496.

Area program fosters understanding of mental illness

LORI GUILFOYLE
staff reporter

"Mental illness isn't catching, but friendship is," is a slogan used by Pawnee Mental Health to promote its compeer program, a program designed to match mentally ill clients with volunteers from the community.

Pawnee Mental Health is the community mental health center for the surrounding 10 counties. Its services include marriage, family, alcohol and drug counseling, in addition to classes that help clients restructure their time and learn about their illnesses while helping them get on with their lives.

Clients participating in the compeer program have been hospitalized at one time for depression, schizophrenia or bipolar disorder.

Thirty volunteers are participating in the Manhattan-Junction City-area program. More than one-third are K-State students, Mary Alice Schlesener, compeer coordinator, said. Volunteers are required to be 18 or older. Because it is an adult program, clients are also 18 or older. Women are matched with women, and men are placed with men. The obligations are to commit one hour a week or four visits a month for one year.

Amy Benson, senior in psychology, became a volunteer in November 1996. Her friend is in her early 30s and diagnosed as a borderline depressant intellectual. They spend time once a week doing various activities.

For example, she said, they have gone to see a movie, to Wal-Mart and to get coffee. Her friend has also been to her house for dinner and to a basketball game. They have also participated in two group activities with other compeer volunteers and friends. When separated during breaks, Benson said she sends letters and postcards.

"I try to involve her in my life as much as I'm involved in hers," she said. "I've introduced her to my friends so that she knows that she is important to me and so she will meet other people."

Benson said her favorite time with her friend happened recently when they went to buy a fish. She said they went to two different pet stores before finding the perfect fish. Her friend picked out a fish Benson now keeps in her room.

"It is our fish," Benson said. "It was something we did together. She is so proud of the fact that she picked out the prettiest fish.

"I know she would feel a sense of loneliness if I wasn't around. I am glad that she has our activities to look forward to each week."

Rob MacDougall II, junior in social work, political science and pre-law, developed an interest in the compeer program while changing his major. He was interested in social work programs and wanted to find a community service project that would expose him to social issues of interest to him.

His father had been involved in the compeer program for several months and enjoyed spending time with his friend, so MacDougall decided to become a volunteer in July 1996.

"It opened my eyes up to a whole new group of people," he said. "Lots of people just pass them up."

Benson said volunteering for the program also gave her a new perspective.

"Being with my friend allows me to better understand the mentally ill. A lot of people develop a phobia about the mentally ill because of their lack of understanding," she said.

People don't understand that the mentally ill can't help what they do, Schlesener said.

"When they are not on medicine, they have no control. It's not their fault."

The mentally ill are stigmatized by society, MacDougall said.

"It feels good to shed some light upon the compeer program and give something back to these people and the community," he said.

MacDougall and his friend, who is schizophrenic, spend every Monday afternoon together at Dairy Queen. He said they visit other places, but Dairy Queen is his friend's preference.

They are now reaching a point where they can talk about different things like social issues and politics. MacDougall said he plans to continue volunteering until he graduates.

"It's not that big of a commitment, the rewards are far greater," he said. Just knowing that he is changing someone's life is all the reward he said he needs.

Lyndsey Miller, senior in psychology, became a volunteer in November 1996 to get experience in the field she plans to pursue after graduation.

She said this opportunity helped her gain a better understanding of whether she would prefer working with children or adults in the field of clinical psychology.

Miller and her friend, who is also diagnosed with schizophrenia, meet every Tuesday to have dinner, go bowling or visit the mall.

"When my commitment is up, it doesn't mean I won't still be her friend," she said.

Volunteers aren't exclusive to any major. Psychology and social work studies are not required, Schlesener said.

"They are volunteers of love, serving mankind," she said. "We could use 20 more." Volunteers are something the program could never have enough of, she said.

MacDougall recommends that others, especially men, try volunteering for the compeer program.

"Males tend to shy away," he said.

A volunteer must have empathy, patience and understanding. Volunteering shouldn't be done for the purpose of impressing someone on a résumé.

"It's not something that should be taken for granted," MacDougall said.

Applications are available in the Pawnee Mental Health office. Applications are reviewed and references are checked before anyone is selected for an interview.

Applicants' names are checked by the Department of Motor Vehicles, where they are screened for driving violations, and volunteers are also screened for a history of child abuse. The interview allows the applicant to learn more about the program and gives administration an opportunity to learn more about them.

If selected as a volunteer, the person undergoes a four-hour training session where topics such as confidentiality, appropriate activities, background on long-term mental illnesses and crisis situations are addressed.

After the training is over, volunteers set up activities with their friends. They are asked to send in a time report every two months, which serves as a record of what volunteers do, but not what they talk about, Schlesener said.

"So many people put their heads in the sand and think there isn't anything they can do. It is important to educate friends about the anti-stigmatism associated with mental illness," Schlesener said. "First of all, they are a person. Secondly, they have an illness."

'Man of La Mancha'

Dreams the Impossible Dream

THE INQUISITOR, played by Evan Tuttle, sophomore in theater, makes his appearance near the beginning of "Man of La Mancha" in McCain Auditorium. "Man of La Mancha" brought in a guest lighting designer, R. Craig Wolf, professor of design at San Diego State University.

Review
Theater

On a quest for the ideal performance, K-State Theatre's production of "Man of La Mancha" opened Thursday night with operatic drama, witty song and a few rough edges.

The musical is a fusion of the lives of early Spanish author Miguel de Cervantes and his literary concoction "Don Quixote." Dale Wasserman adapted his original play concept into the musical's book. The music was written by Mitch Leigh with lyrics by Joe Darion.

Leigh's music is a blend of flamenco and Broadway show tunes — just a hint of a Spanish connection razzle-dazzled into a variety of showstoppers. The standout song, and now a standard for lounge singers everywhere, is "The Impossible Dream," the idealistic musical embodiment of Quixote's vision of chivalry.

To hear Robert Goulet sing it is to truly know its value as camp, though sung by Timothy Bonnell as Quixote on Thursday night one is again struck by the sweet naiveté of a true idealist. Sure, it's still corny, but the theater is about believing. Bonnell infuses the show with much-needed energy with his first song, of the show's name, which he carries smoothly.

Truly, Bonnell is the heart of the show as the Cervantes/Quixote character. As the poet Cervantes, he is thrown into a Seville dungeon and faced with winning over a cynical jury of prisoners, chiefly a frustrated duke (Brian Andrew Floyd). To keep the prisoners from burning his manuscript, Cervantes crafts a story of the bumbling, romantic Quixote who is driven by a dream to adventure as a noble knight.

Along the way, Quixote's willingness to see with innocent eyes only leads him to mistake an inn for a castle, a windmill for a dragon and a wench for his lady, whom he calls Dulcinea (Amy Verdon). He is joined by his trusty sidekick, Sancho Panza (Erik Hogan), who sticks with him because he "likes him."

The show, grounded in great literature but spiked with the dueling stories, is a Broadway operetta ending with the tragedy of Quixote's death. But not without letting the now-cheerful prisoners glean hope from Cervantes' story in an inspirational conclusion as the poet laureate of the prison is taken to face his inquisitors.

Verdon gives a strong performance with powerful vocals as the hard hussy who eventually gives into Quixote's chivalrous manners and proposals to her as his Dulcinea, but only when it is too late. Hogan, who seems a bit too hayseed, interjects humor throughout, especially in his frippery swan song "A Little Gossip." He can't sing, but he's got style.

The show loses some focus in a few smaller details: too many jokes are thrown away and lost, some actors slack off a performance of mere line reading, and staging becomes a bit restless and ambiguous with such a large ensemble (at least 15) on stage throughout the show.

The strengths of the show, however, are many. A rape scene involving Dulcinea is truly frightening. Doug Hurley's fight choreography is like something out of the "Batman" television series, what with its funny sight gags and pratfalls. Ditto Diana Yamabayashi's Moorish dance sequence that is as funny as it is kinky.

Director Charlotte MacFarland has taken the baton from Luke Kahlich, who left K-State last year after many years of directing good shows, and run with it. "La Mancha" could have easily fallen into a tiresome nostalgia, but it is instead humorous and occasionally outrageous, and always a visual treat.

"La Mancha" originally opened on Nov. 22, 1965, off-Broadway. Although not technically on Broadway, the show was considered as much because it met Broadway's contractual requirements (it played on Broadway after 1968 until its close in 1971).

Therefore, nothing stopped the show from winning the Tony Award for Best Musical along with Tonys for star Richard Kiley, composer Leigh and lyricist Darion. It also won the New York Drama Critics' Circle award for Best Musical.

The original production was praised by critics for its unconventionally sparse set with no significant scene changes in the traditional Broadway manner. K-State's production stays true to the original concept.

Technically, Thursday night's performance was stunning. David Centers' set, the dank, somber Spanish dungeon filled with smoke hiding recesses and chambers, sets yet another benchmark for K-State theater. The periodic lowering of a giant staircase cued by nightmarish music preceded the breaks in Cervantes' story, when the reality of the Inquisition returns to the stage.

It wouldn't be nearly as effective without the scenic lighting design of guest artist R. Craig Wolf, on loan from San Diego State University. Wolf peppered the show with a variety of dramatic effects — the allusion of a windmill, the foreboding glare of the lowered staircase — that subtly intensify the plot.

Dana Pinkston's costumes were all about rags, dirt and little color for the peasants, but she had fun with the exoticism of the Moorish dancers and the dandyism of the soldiers and the plume-topped men in the Knight of Mirrors sequence.

Perhaps opening-night jitters account for the imprecision of the ensemble, but "La Mancha" is a triumph for K-State and a healthy dose of idealism for any cynic.

▶ K-State Theatre's "Man of La Mancha" plays at 8 tonight and Saturday night in McCain Auditorium. Tickets are $8 for students and seniors citizens and $11 for the general public. Call 532-6428 for more information.

Morrissey thrills crowd in Lawrence show

PHIL KELLUM
staff writer

Music
Review

One of England's most famous and notorious musicians graced the stage of Liberty Hall in Lawrence on Wednesday night.

He only goes by one name. That name is Morrissey.

His solo work and his work with the Smiths in the '80s and his solo work has been influential to hundreds, if not thousands, of bands across the globe.

And he played in Lawrence, something I never imagined would take place.

The Smoking Popes from Chicago opened the show to a packed house and played a good mix of songs, ranging from new stuff to old stuff to stuff I didn't recognize.

The band even threw in a bit of Elvis Costello's "Allison" at the end of its second song, much to my delight and surprise.

The Popes have added a guitarist for the tour, leaving vocalist Josh Caterer free to sing without having to handle rhythm-guitar duties, except for the few songs he played on acoustic guitar.

The standout songs of the set were "I Know That You Love Me" off the new album, "Destination Failure" and "Need You Around" from the second album, "Born To Quit."

After only half an hour, Smoking Popes left the stage all too soon.

The crowd was perhaps the kindest, most polite and receptive crowd I have ever seen for an opening act.

People clapped after every song and paid attention to the Popes. It was very cool to see that.

After about a 45-minute break and some chanting of "Morrissey! Morrissey!" by some of the crowd members, the house lights went down and the stage lights went up.

Strobes flashed and lights went off as a massive prerecorded drum-solo intro played for three or four minutes.

Then out strolled the man and his band to thunderous applause and screaming from the sold-out crowd.

Morrissey stepped up to the microphone and said, "Howdy."

Several gladiolas flew toward the stage from fans in the front, which is a tradition dating back to Smiths' shows.

Morrissey and crew launched into "Boy Racer" and set the stage for an hour-long set that was more than simply another concert. It was a moving, almost a spiritual, experience.

After "Boy Racer," Morrissey introduced the band by saying, "We're five bastards from England."

Morrissey occasionally walked to the edge of the stage and reached out to shake hands with fans. Some had cards and gifts for him, which he took and put in his pockets.

For the first time since the break-up of the Smiths 10 years ago, Morrissey performed Smiths' songs live.

The band false-started "Paint A Vulgar Picture" to manic screams and cheers from the crowd and stopped just as fast.

Morrissey jokingly said, "Fooled you. See, I used to be in this band called the Clash."

Then they kicked into it for real, and the crowd went crazy by singing along and loving every minute of it.

He followed it with his newest single, "Alma Matters," from his new album, "Maladjusted."

Morrissey even played his biggest hit as a solo artist, "The More You Ignore Me, The Closer I Get," which I kind of expected but wouldn't have been surprised if he hadn't played it.

After closing the set with "Speedway," Morrissey and gang left the stage. The crowd began stomping, clapping and chanting for them to come back.

After a few minutes, they came back for one last song.

That song was the Smiths' "Shoplifters of the World Unite." It was the highlight of the entire show.

Now, I've been to hundreds of shows, and I have never seen a crowd go that crazy to a single song in my life and probably never will again.

Guitarists Boz Boorer and Alain Whyte hit the opening chords, Jonny Bridgwood began plucking out bass notes, and Spencer Cobrin banged out the beats. The crowd was whipped into a frenzy.

They began throwing themselves at the stage to simply touch Morrissey.

Members of the crowd flung themselves over the security barrier, sometimes four or five at a time to grasp Morrissey's hand for a split second. He made sure to shake every hand that came toward him.

It seemed like the entire crowd was singing along to "Shoplifters," too.

Then it was over. The band vanished. The house lights went up. The security guards were telling everyone to go home. This was more of an experience and an event than a normal concert.

If you missed this, then you should kick yourself repeatedly. It was that good.

NICHOLS

Donahue's ranch that day to steal explosives used in the bomb that destroyed the Oklahoma City federal building.

On Wednesday, Donahue and FBI agents testified that Nichols kept anti-government writings at his home and once suggested the government had to be overthrown in retaliation for Waco.

The testimony marked a shift in strategy by prosecutors, who had called survivors of the bombing to give emotional testimony a day earlier.

Jurors deciding Nichols' fate heard testimony of his alleged hatred of the government, which prosecutors contend compelled him to join McVeigh in bombing the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in April 1995.

The blast killed 168 people and injured hundreds of others.

Defense attorneys reminded jurors that not once in Nichols' writings or conversations did he say he was going to take any action based on his beliefs.

A search of Nichols' home in Herington, Kan., turned up anti-government writings similar to those found in McVeigh's car after the bombing, FBI agents testified.

One piece of paper found at the home referred to the government raid on the Branch Davidian compound near Waco, Texas, and contained the Thomas Jefferson quote: "The tree of liberty must be refreshed from time to time with the blood of patriots and tyrants."

When the piece of paper was shown to jurors, Nichols tapped his index finger firmly on the defense table. His attorney, Michael Tigar, put his arm around Nichols to calm him.

Nichols, 42, could be sentenced to death if convicted of murder, conspiracy and weapons charges.

Gregory to the Campus Development Advisory Committee.

• Bills 97/98/44-46 and 97/98/50-55 passed. These bills allocated funds to campus organizations for the spring 1998 semester. American Civil Liberties Union, Habitat for Humanity, Latter-Day Saints Society of America, Muslim Student Association, KSU Student Chapter of Project Management Institute, National United Law Enforcement Officers of America, Study Abroad Club and Chi Alpha Christian Fellowship were allocated funds.

• Resolution 97/98/38 passed by unanimous consent. This resolution stated Senate's support for select Students' Advisory Council initiatives for 1997-98. The council is a Kansas Board of Regents committee composed of regents institutions' student body presidents. The initiatives include financial aid, technology and other information-based proposals.

• Resolution 97/98/39 passed by unanimous consent. This resolution stated Senate's support for various "intercultural competency" programs and presented suggestions for competency programs to the regents and the Students' Advisory Council.

• Resolution 97/98/40 passed by unanimous consent. This resolution commended Arts and Sciences Sen. Leo Prieto for being selected as Outstanding Intern at the U.S. Hispanic American Leadership Organization National Conference and his work with Latino youth in Garden City, Kan.

• Resolution 97/98/41 passed by unanimous consent. This resolution commended Jason Heinrich and Sara Reser for their selection as K-State Ambassadors.

Giannoulas said he's probably mock-sparred with the dinosaur character about a hundred times, but it's only a small part of his act.

"On the face of this it seems comical, but it really clears your sinuses when you get served a federal lawsuit," he said.

He said he will keep the purple dinosaur in his act during upcoming performances at hockey games in South Carolina.

"I used to think that Barney was a lovable character, but now I think he's just the biggest bully on the block," Giannoulas said.

LEADER

This commitment to helping others achieve their goals meant spending a summer working with youth in Garden City. He was one of 20 student community organizers chosen in 15 different states by the United States Hispanic Leadership Institute.

Prieto recruited about 25 eighth-graders from his hometown for his Hispanic Youth Achievement Project. Activities for the group included organizing athletic competitions, community service projects, leadership training and inviting prominent Hispanic community leaders for discussions.

"I chose to work with youth," Prieto said. "Each and every one of us has an obligation to change the world and a responsibility to make a difference."

Prieto was also involved with the Midwest Northeast Voter Education Registration, in which he surpassed his goal of registering 500 new Hispanic voters in his hometown. His promotion of cultural awareness, community involvement, athletics and academics earned him the award of Outstanding Intern of the Year at the U.S. HALO National Conference Oct. 8-12 in Chicago.

"I saw so much talent and potential this summer. We take for granted what we have, but we need to appreciate it and give back," he said. "I've learned that you can't do it by yourself. If we get people working together for a goal, we can get it done. We can accomplish anything."

Prohaska said although it is important to dress like the character, precision isn't necessary.

"Modern cloth is wonderful, and it's difficult to find pure cotton or pure wool when everything has become synthesized," he said.

He also said constructive criticism is appreciated if it isn't coming from an "authenticity Nazi."

Prohaska said many members make their own weapons, but few make a living doing merchandising. He said it is rare to make and sell the big-ticket items.

The Shire of Spinning Winds will have a Regional Fighter Practice on Dec. 13 at the National Guard Unit near the Manhattan Municipal Airport.

Hays said her main claim to fame is sewing, but she also has a short sword and a suit of armor.

The Calontir kingdom includes Kansas, Missouri, most of Iowa, Nebraska and the northwest corner of Arkansas.

It is a warfare shire that fights in large groups of 80 to 120 people rather than as individuals or small groups.

"Individual fighting is a lot different than group fighting," Prohaska said. "Everyone has a job and place. If you try to do it like John Wayne did it, everyone will die."

the BIG 12 rundown

COLORADO

TODAY'S BET
at Iowa State
11:30 a.m.
The 4-4 Buffaloes will trounce the 1-7 Cyclones.

These squads battled in a 91-point, 49-42 win by the Buffaloes in 1996 at Boulder, but their defensive improvement probably precludes another such scoring display. The Cyclones and Buffs are Nos. 1 and 2 in Big 12 team passing, though, with 240.5 and 210.9 aerial yards per game, respectively. ISU has increased its rushing output behind Darren Davis while Colorado allows 197.5 ground yards per contest.

BAYLOR

TODAY'S BET
at Texas A&M
1 p.m.
The 2-6 Bears will be rocked by the 6-2 Aggies.

These two teams are noted for their physical bouts and have the size in both lines to make the 1997 game another head-knocker. With the plethora of Texas residents (the teams' rosters are 90 percent Texans) on both crews, this is a familiar setting. The Aggies' quick-striking offense tallies 36.4 points per game while Baylor refuses to give up the ball regularly, with only 11 turnovers in eight games. Today's tilt looms big for the rest of both squads' seasons.

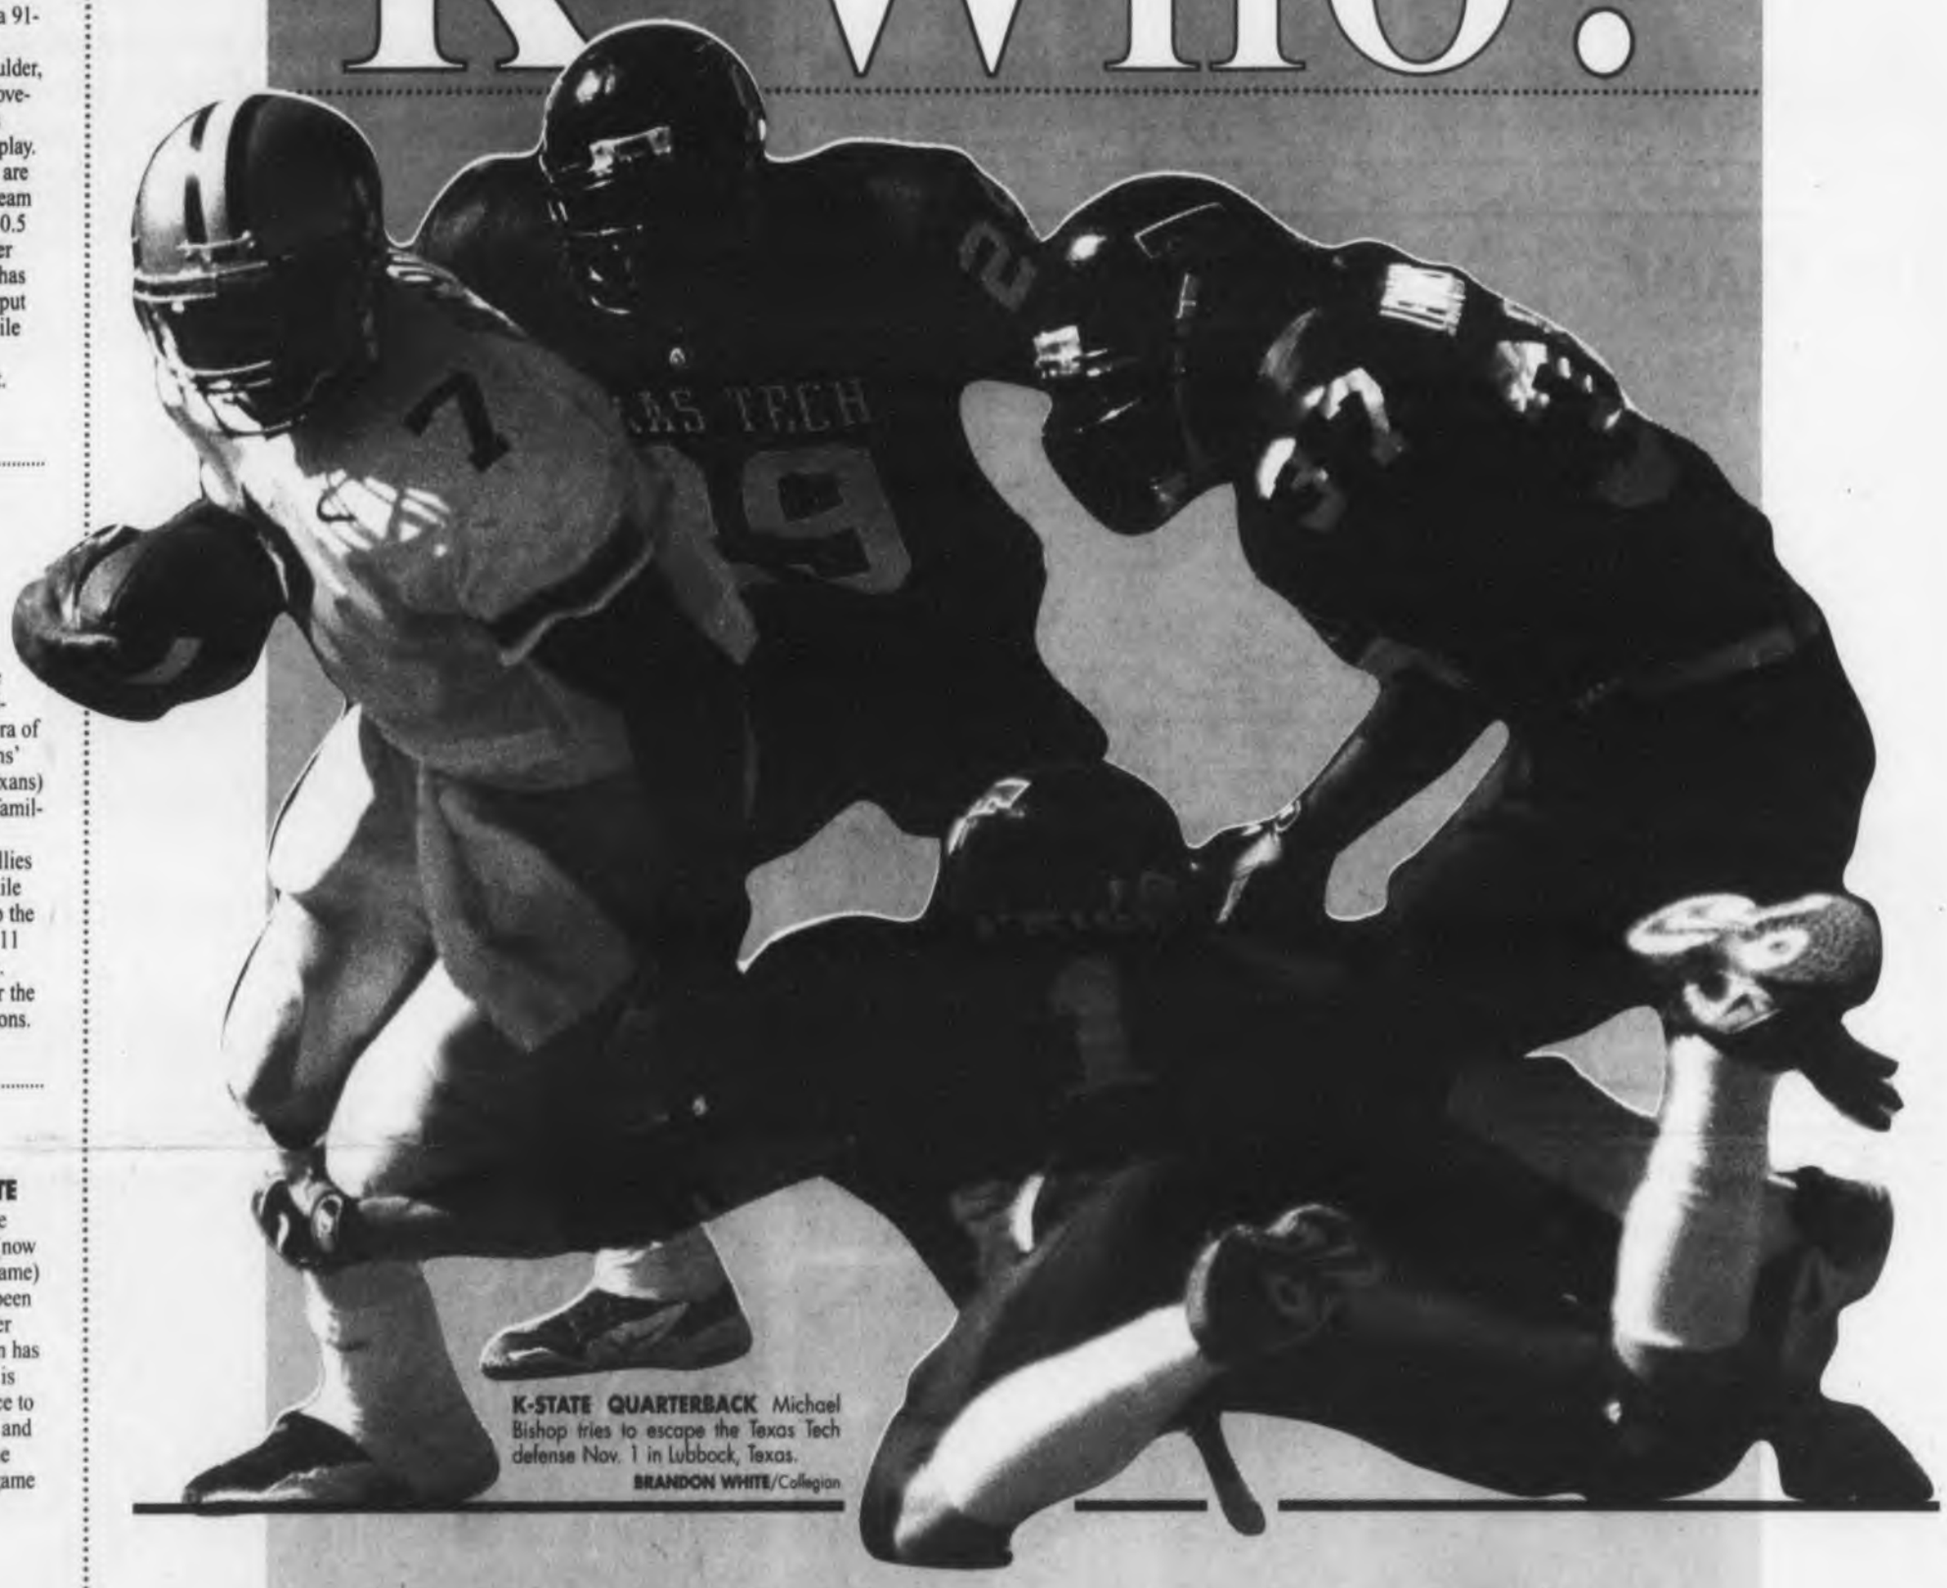
OKLAHOMA STATE

TODAY'S BET
at Oklahoma
1 p.m.
This intrastate rivalry should be a close one, but look for the Cowboys to win.

OSU has been among the nation's scoring leaders (now 18th at 34.4 points per game) while the Sooners have been able to play slightly better run defense as the season has progressed. Team health is also of utmost importance to each team, as both OSU and Oklahoma have lost some strength in the running game due to injuries.

NEBRASKA

TODAY'S BET
at Missouri
2:30 p.m.
The Tigers want a fourth-straight upset win, but the Huskers will remain unbeaten.



There's a remarkable similarity in what the teams try to accomplish offensively through seasoned quarterbacks who can operate the option. Nebraska is tops nationally with 400 rushing yards per game, while Mizzou is sixth with 267.2 ground yards per game. And the teams combine for 266.3 yards per game passing, so pity the defenses.

TEXAS TECH

TODAY'S BET
at Texas
6 p.m.
The defending conference champs will fall to 1-5 after losing to Tech.

This great rivalry has had its share of thrills, chills, heavily pass-minded games and contests where neither team has passed unless down and distance forced the issue. It's a battle of Ricky Williams of Texas vs. Ricky Williams of Texas Tech, with the Longhorns' version holding a 3-inch, 30-pound weight advantage in a battle of standout running backs. There's also intrigue about the final meeting of quarterbacks James Brown of UT and Tech's Zebbie Lethridge — each four-year starters.

Sunflower Showdown simmers for Cats

STORY BY SUN DEE MILLS

As K-State began its climb into the football history books, defensive end Dirk Ochs was a freshman in 1992. His brother Travis, junior Wildcat linebacker, remembered that back then it wasn't cool to be a Cat.

"When Dirk decided to come here, most of the people from my area didn't think very highly of it," the younger Ochs said.

The Ochs brothers are from Overland Park, Kan., the heart of Kansas Jayhawk country.

"When Dirk started here, my mom would take us shopping and we'd see more Nebraska, Colorado and KU stuff," Ochs said. "K-State stuff was hard to find."

The same feeling surrounded Wichita, home of Wildcat place kicker Jamie Rheem.

"Society was leaning towards KU, the same with my parents," Rheem said. "I knew all the coaches and had taken recruiting visits up there."

But the Cats' successes made Rheem satisfied with his decision.

"I liked K-State's coaches and facilities better," Rheem said. "I made a good choice."

Rheem, along with his teammates, haven't experienced a time the Cats didn't dominate this rivalry. After beating the Hawks the past four years in the Sunflower Showdown, the game has taken on less urgency for the Cats.

The Hawks, however, need to win this game or next week's game against Texas to qualify for a bowl game. Ochs said he was sure if the Hawks could choose a win, it'd be over the Cats.

AFTER BEATING THE JAYHAWKS THE PAST FOUR YEARS IN THE SUNFLOWER SHOWDOWN, THE GAME HAS TAKEN ON LESS URGENCY FOR THE CATS. THE HAWKS, HOWEVER, NEED TO WIN THIS GAME OR NEXT WEEK'S GAME AGAINST TEXAS TO QUALIFY FOR A BOWL GAME.

"They'd much rather be us," Ochs said. "They could kill two birds with one stone. They will try to make it a bad day for us."

Offensively, that will be a challenge for the No. 112-ranked Kansas offense vs. the Cats' defense, ranked No. 5 in the country. The Hawks' career-rushing leader June Henley and go-to receiver Isaac Byrd graduated, and quarterback Zac Wegner has never seen action against the Cats.

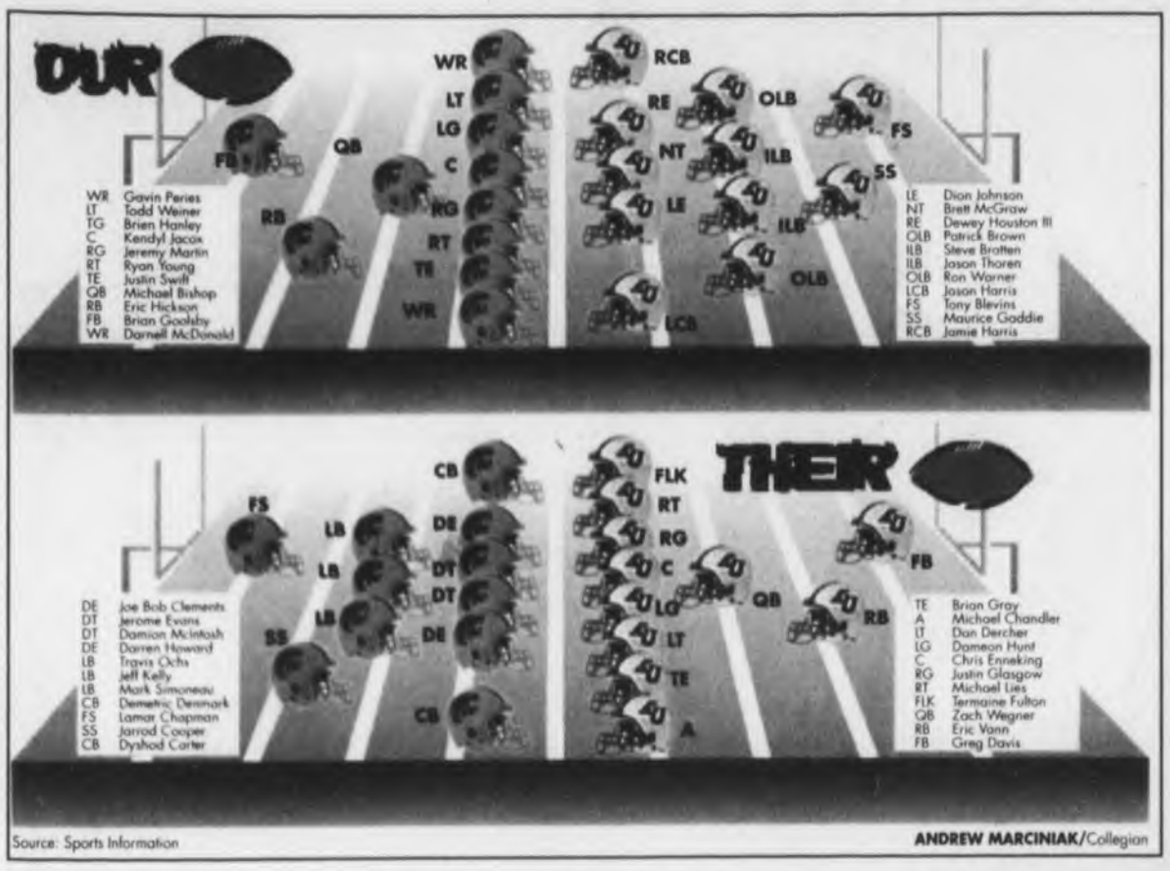
The Hawks' original starting quarterback, Matt Johner, missed three games because of a broken finger suffered in the Oklahoma game Oct. 4. Johner and running back Eric Vann are the Hawks' lone seniors on offense. Vann is 37th on the KU scoring list with 1,347 career yards and leads the Hawks with five touchdowns this season.

"Eric Vann is a very impressive running back who's running the ball well right now," Coach Bill Snyder said. "We tried to recruit Eric out of high school. He's managed good numbers."

Overall, Snyder didn't think KU had the most ineffective offense in the country. It wouldn't have five wins if it did, he said. Snyder also said it was unfair to judge the team solely on the low ranking.

"The fact is that they have made a steady improvement," Snyder said. "People have been critical of their offense, but that's a new system, and it is more complex to draw together than defensive schemes would be."

The Hawks' defense is a different story. On the season, the defense has 27 quarterback sacks for minus 183 yards, 10 more than the Hawks recorded during the entire 1996 season. Outside linebacker Ron Warner has 12.5 of those sacks alone and leads the country in sacks. Overall, Warner has 17.5 tackles for minus 119 yards.



Snyder said the Hawks' experience in this area contributes to their success.

"Defensively, they return seven or eight guys who were starters last year," Snyder said. "That doesn't include certainly one of the best pass rushers in the conference. They've got good personnel."

The Hawk defense has also scored four of the team's 15 touchdowns, three on interceptions and one fumble return.

Special teams-wise, Hawk defensive back Jason Harris has blocked three punts in the past two games, two of which were returned for touchdowns. True freshman kicker Joe Garcia is nine-of-11 on field goal attempts.

But Snyder was pleased with his special-teams' performance against Texas Tech, calling punter James Garcia's kicking performance crucial to the game's outcome.

"We've got good specialists, and when they perform well, they are very, very capable," Snyder said. "The kicking game and forcing Texas Tech into poor field position was as important as our defense."

On all sides of the ball, Snyder said the showdown means a lot to the Kansas native players, but for more reasons than the intrastate rivalry.

"KU is playing for the opportunity to be involved in a bowl game," Snyder said. "We're playing for some opportunities within the bowl system, ourselves. This means a lot to our players."

Visions of bowl games have the Hawks talking. Cat junior long snapper Brandon Knowles went to El Dorado High School with Vann and said he talked to his former teammate Monday about the upcoming matchup.

"They're going to come in here with the attitude that they need one more game for a bowl," Knowles said. "It's got to be either us or Texas, and they want to get that win."

Although sophomore linebacker Mark Simoneau didn't go to high school with any Hawks, he said the history of the rivalry makes the game more intense.

"Knowing they're an hour away from us, it's important to the Kansas guys like me," Simoneau, from Smith Center, Kan., said. "It's fun to play a game like that."

Knowles said the intrastate bragging rights over former teammates were the highlight of a victory.

"It's a big game regardless," Knowles said, "but I'd be lying if I didn't say it wasn't more to play against guys I played in high school."

NEW BOOK

David Smale, author of "The Ahearn Tradition" and "The Story: Kansas State Football — The Greatest Turnaround in College Football History," will produce a book on the top-40 athletes in K-State history. The book is scheduled for release in May.

The book will be a series of features on the top-40 athletes in school history. The first criterion to be featured will be athletes inducted into the K-State athletic Hall of Fame. The list will include all sports at K-State.

"I am extremely excited to be involved in another project with Kansas State," Smale said. "I bleed purple, and I have enjoyed the past opportunities to visit with K-Staters around the country. I am looking forward to that chance again."

THE SCOOP. David Smale has produced another K-State book that features the top-40 athletes in K-State history.

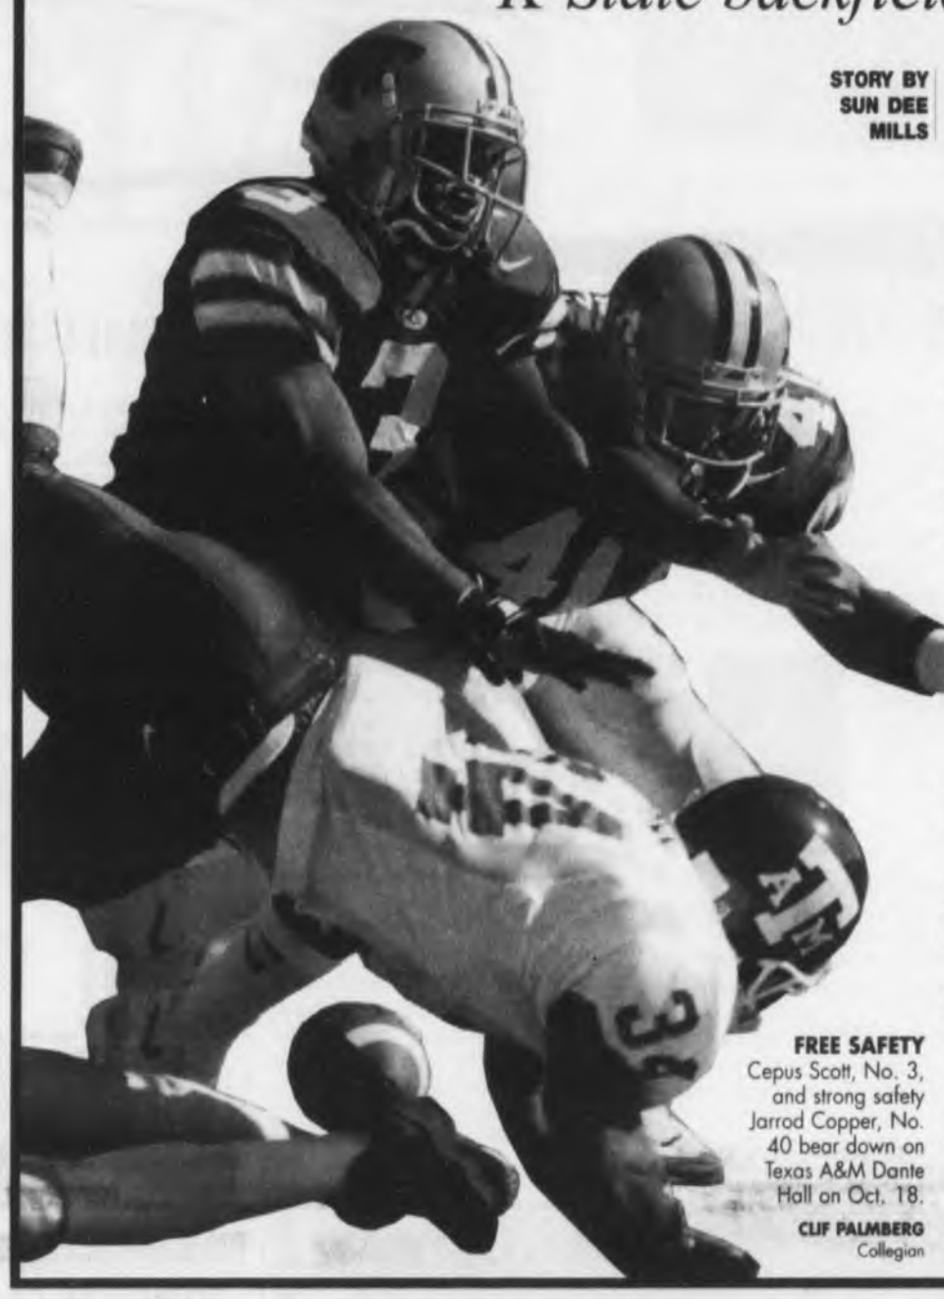
Ramage

RAMAGE INJURED

K-State forward Nicky Ramage has a sprained right ankle Thursday morning in practice. The sophomore averaged 3.4 points and 2.7 rebounds per game last season in 11 starts. She could be back on the court when the women's basketball team starts its exhibition season Nov. 13 against the Victoria All-Stars.

MICHAEL BISHOP reappeared for reporters Tuesday at K-State's weekly press conference.

BISHOP SPEAKS



After being a silent leader since the Missouri game Oct. 11, junior quarterback Michael Bishop reappeared before reporters Tuesday. Although Bishop was taken from a postgame TV interview after the Missouri game, he said there was no specific reason he hadn't talked to the media.

"It was just something Coach (Bill Snyder) and I decided on," Bishop said. "I just adjusted to it and concentrated on football."

Since his ankle injury in the Texas A&M game, Bishop said his performance has been limited. "I haven't been trying to press as hard as I used to," Bishop said. "The ankle's OK. I just have to be careful."

SECONDARY EDUCATION

K-State backfield steps up against TexasTech

FREE SAFETY Cepus Scott, No. 3, and strong safety Jarrod Copper, No. 40 bear down on Texas A&M Dante Hall on Oct. 18.
CLIF PALMBERG Collegian

STORY BY SUN DEE MILLS

Until now, the K-State defense has battled teams that ran tough running attacks — Ohio, Nebraska, Missouri and Texas A&M, to name a few.

But Nov. 1 weekend, the Wildcats met Texas Tech quarterback Zebbie Lethridge and receivers Donnie Hart and Malcom McKenzie, which was a true test of the Cats' secondary.

McKenzie ranks 33rd in the nation and first in the Big 12 in receptions per game and has caught 37 passes for 378 yards.

Hart has already had three of Tech's top-six single-game reception yardage games in school history. Because he's suffering from a hamstring pull, Hart didn't play against Nebraska or Texas A&M, and he dropped out of the national rankings.

This season, Hart has been tied for ninth in the nation for receptions per game with 7.40 and was seventh in the nation in reception yardage with an 112.80 average.

"We knew Hart was going to come out and try hard, even though he had that hamstring pull," senior cornerback Demetric Denmark said.

And the K-State secondary was prepared for a tough passing game. Hart and McKenzie only caught a combined four passes for a total of 39 yards.

"The defense did a great job," Denmark said. "Those receivers are supposed to be all legitimate with 37 catches between them. I guess they're the best of the Big 12."

Defensive coordinator Mike Stoops said the Cat defense's ability to contain Lethridge was key to the secondary's success.

"Zebbie's a lot like Michael (Bishop, Cat quarterback)," Stoops said. "They did a good job keeping him confined and not letting him scramble."

The pressure Lethridge endured at the hands of the Cat defense limited him to eight of 27 completions for 64 yards, with his longest pass reaching 15 yards.

"The defense put pressure on Zebbie," Denmark said. "It made our job a lot easier."

Coach Bill Snyder said he was satisfied with his cornerbacks' efforts.

"Denmark and (Dyshod) Carter played with confidence," Snyder said. "They definitely caused Zebbie to hold the ball more. It can take eight to nine seconds to run him down."

As far as the Tech game being a breakout performance for the secondary, Denmark agreed.

"It kind of was," Denmark said. "We just had to bone up and play like we know how to play."

In the past, K-State has traditionally had a strong secondary, with All-American New England Patriots' cornerback Chris Canty as an anchor for the past three years. Cornerback Joe Gordon, free safety Mario Smith and Kansas City Chief cornerback Clyde Johnson graduated last spring, while Canty made himself eligible for the NFL draft, which left many starting positions open.

Of this season's defensive backs, only Denmark and strong safety Monty Spiller are seniors. The youth of the group was a cause for concern earlier in the season, but Stoops said it's coming along just fine.

"They're young, but they're gaining experience and getting maturity that they need on the field," Stoops said.

With one passing-oriented team in its pocket, Denmark said the secondary was ready for more.

"It's great to get a game against a passing team under our belt," Denmark said. "We have a great secondary, but we don't always get the credit."

"THE CROWD CAME OFF AS VERY HOSTILE."
JEFF KELLY, K-STATE LINEBACKER

Linebacker Jeff Kelly entered a contest of his own Oct. 25: a battle with Sooner fans who harassed him because he chose K-State as his college football home instead of Oklahoma.

SURVIVING hostility

SAM FELSENFELD
staff writer

K-State linebacker Jeff Kelly knew he'd have his work cut out for him going into Oct. 25's game at Oklahoma.

For starters, as middle linebacker, he knew it would be tough having the Sooners' 6-foot-5-inch, 282-pound center, Bruce McClure, coming at him full speed all afternoon.

He also knew he'd have it tough trying to contain Oklahoma's option masters, quarterback Eric Moore and running back De'Mond Parker, a Heisman Trophy candidate.

But the toughest people he had to face Saturday weren't playing for the Sooners. They weren't even sitting on the bench.

They were the fans sitting in the stands, and to put things delicately, they didn't like him.

Kelly is a subject of controversy in Norman. He backed out of a commitment to play with the Sooners so he could be a Wildcat instead.

But there's more to it than that. Kelly, who was the top-rated community college linebacker by several publications last season, originally agreed to play for K-State.

And then he changed his mind and wanted to be a Sooner.

And then he changed his mind and wanted to be a Wildcat — again.

He eventually landed with the Cats, a matter that doesn't rest easily with Sooner fans. And they let him know that.

"The crowd came off as very hostile," Kelly said of the game.

He said the hostility started during pre-game warm-ups, and the comments he heard weren't very polite.

"They said a lot of stuff," he said. "You know, a lot of family things."

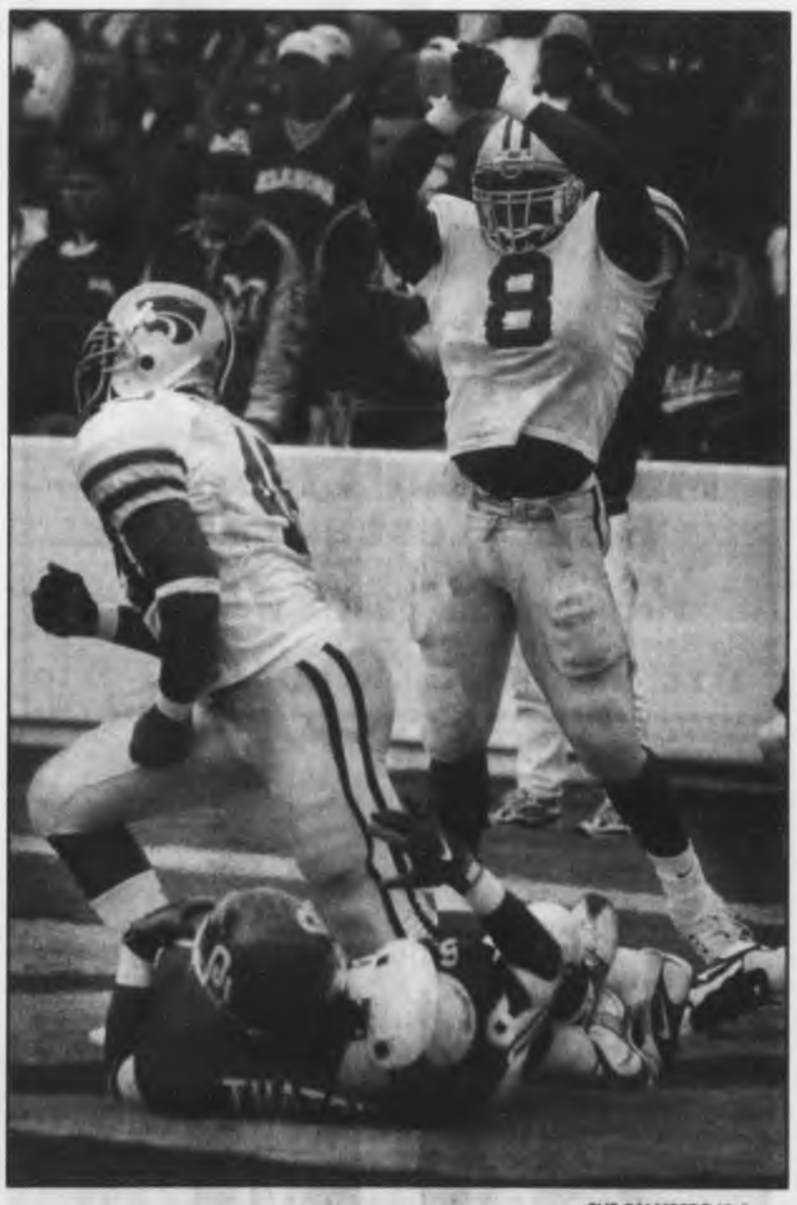
Part of the trouble with the situation involved the way he decided to be a Wildcat the second time.

During the week leading up to the game, Oklahoma coaches alleged that K-State coaches impersonated Sooners coach John Blake and tricked Kelly while trying to regain his services.

"That's not true at all," Kelly said. "I don't know where they get that. There was nothing like that."

Still, the Oklahoma fans were unhappy with him, and apparently, his family, too.

But that's fine with Kelly. His family was at the game — the first time they've seen him play Division I-A football.



He said he's happy to have played well in a victory in front of his parents.

And he credits, ironically, the Oklahoma fans who said impolite things about Mom and Dad Kelly. He said the heckling was far from bothersome.

"I took that to my advantage," he said. "I used that to help me play hard."

The Cats' 26-7 victory was their fifth consecutive win over the Sooners — a sign of a turnaround, one team on the rise and the other on the decline. After all, even with the five-game losing streak, Oklahoma still leads the all-time series 63-16-4.

Gavin Peries finds success on field despite medical problems

After going through grueling two-a-days and months of practices, most of K-State's wide receivers are conditioned well enough to run their routes downfield and easily come back at full speed the next play.

But Gavin Peries can't do that.

Make him run 20 yards at full speed, and he's taking deep breaths. He can make it through an offensive series, but he'll definitely be tired when it's over.

But that's not because he's out of shape.

Nor does he suffer from game-day hangovers.

And he sure doesn't smoke.

Peries battles for breath every time he runs downfield because of his asthma.

However, judging by his numbers, he's winning the battle. He is K-State's leading receiver with 10 catches. He leads the team in receiving yardage and yardage per game and has the highest yardage-per-catch average of all the Wildcats' regular receivers.

Still, it hasn't always been easy. Peries transferred to K-State from Pasadena City College, Calif., which is about 30 minutes east of Los Angeles. He thought the lack of smog in Kansas would help him, but the Midwest heat brought allergies, which made his asthma worse than it was in California.

"The hardest adjustment for me was when I came here," he said. "For the first time in my life, I felt like it was gonna beat me. I never gave up before, but I know a couple of times at practice I stopped. I felt like it beat me. It was the hardest thing for me to adjust to. Now I think I have it under control. I have better medication. It's not much of a factor any more."

Peries uses his inhalers 12 times a day and isn't too worried about having an asthma attack on the football field. Trainers and coaches hold his medication for him on the sidelines in case he has a problem,

I want to tell you a little secret: I used to be a Jayhawk. Now, you can stop writing the angry letters. I realized the error of my ways, didn't I?

Some of you might call me a turncoat. I call it a wise career and social move.

For reasons not pertinent to this column, I left KU to pursue other interests. When I returned to college, I chose K-State because I had a sister here, and I knew no one in Lawrence. My sister said, "You'll love it here. I promise."

She was right. After two years at the school on top of Mount Oread, I never found a comfortable niche. If I had, I wouldn't be writing this column.

Within a week in Wildcat Country, I found that niche, along with three other ex-Jayhawks who had the same problem. I am thankful I made that decision, because I have received opportunities here I would have never seen at KU.

Opportunities like experiencing true football fans. In the infamous words of Coach Bill Snyder, "No other school can say they brought 45,000 fans across the state line to watch a football game." And despite the heartbreaking Cotton Bowl loss, the fans are still there, as classy as ever.

I got the opportunity to see a team compete in its first New Year's Day bowl game. I can't predict how long modern-day KU football fans (if there are any) will have to wait for that to happen.

And I got to experience a roll-up-your-sleeves, smash-mouth type of football that's played the same way every year. Regardless of the players on the field, Wildcat coaches instill the same methods in each player in uniform — just get the job done.

This year's Wildcat team is doing that — and then some. Snyder said in Tuesday's news conference that matchups would be key for this game. After looking at the numbers, there is no comparison. The Cats top every category.

OFFENSIVE LINE: Piece of cake. The Hawks have switched around players in their positions so much on the O-line, reading the depth charts must be a dizzying experience for them.

Justin Glasgow and Jerome Parks have reversed tackle and guard duties. Parks has taken a back seat to Michael Lies at right tackle on the two-deep, and Lies is one of three walk-ons on the Hawks' O-line. Just three games ago, Dan Dercher was moved from defensive end to left tackle.

And the Cats? Behind the biggest offensive line in school history, the Cat running game is set to break school rushing records this season. EDGE: CATS

I'm not going to ridicule K-State, the education it provides or the demographic consistency of its student body.

I (unfortunately) pay taxes and actually care about the quality of education the state institutions provide. I know and am related to a lot of people at the other school. And I'm certain that the student bodies are more similar than either would like to admit.

And the game doesn't matter anyway.

Oh, it has mattered when, after defeats in football the past four years, I have returned to southeast Kansas or have seen my two brothers who attended K-State.

For the past three years, I have logically replied to insults and the like:

1. K-State is not Kansas' biggest rival. My training to be a Kansas Student Ambassador taught me this. The correct answer is Missouri. Unfortunately, I think this only applies to people who remember when the Mizzou rivalry was bigger or to people who are from the greater Kansas City area. Color the rest of the state purple or crimson and blue, but don't mix the colors.

2. Wait until basketball. For your information, the dates are Jan. 17 and Feb. 14 this season. But Wildcat fans seem to believe that one win on the turf is more important than two on the court.

3. Purple is ugly. It's just a color preference. Really.

4. At least our school song does not resemble "I've Been Working on the Railroad." What is that, and must the K-State Marching Band play it all the time? There should be laws.

5. The Jayhawk might be a mythical mascot, but that Powercat is a nonexistent graphic.

That doesn't look like a cat any more than Willie does.

It is hoped that this is not a preview for my trips home for the holidays. But the insults won't hurt my feelings, and my logic remains intact.

The game hasn't been played yet, but both Division I, football-playing universities in Kansas already have lost.

Both schools are losers when a sold-out game featuring a certain bowl team and a possible bowl team are relegated to pay-per-view by television officials in charge of the Big 12 Conference contract.

Not only does the snub limit fan access to the game, but it damages recruiting for both schools when they try to compete in the Big 12 region.

A big reason for the lack of respect is lack of schedule strength. K-State played and defeated Northern Illinois.

K-State's football tradition started more than 100 years ago with two games against Fort Riley. Those early days seem half a world away when looking at the today's program — K-State has gone to four bowl games in the past four years.

As the program has improved, so has the number of Wildcat fans.

K-State's football history has developed a parallel.

Some might call it

WILDCAT TRADITION

STUDENTS GO WILD as the public address announcer calls another K-State touchdown. When he yells "Good for a Wildcat touchdown" fans yell with him and throw their arms in the air in the touchdown sign.

SO WHAT HAPPENS BEFORE THE GAME?

STEP ONE. About an hour before kickoff, the pre-game starts. The band storms the field and plays K-State's fight song.

STEP TWO. The fight song is followed by the "Star Spangled Banner" and then the "Wildcat March." The band plays the alma mater, and students and alumni sing along.

STEP THREE. After the alma mater, the tempo is kicked up again with the fight song as the band clears the field. Then, while the teams are about ready to come out of the locker rooms, Willie the Wildcat makes his entrance. His pre-performance skits range from an Adam Sandler song to a "Cheers" serenade or occasionally Willie comes barrelling out in his motorcyle.

STEP FOUR. Willie is responsible for leading the "K-S-U" chant. This yell has been a K-State tradition for many years.

STEP FIVE. The football team makes its entrance. The cheerleaders tumble, the Classy Cats dance and the band plays.

STEP SIX. The "Wabash Cannonball" is also played at this time. Whenever students hear "Wabash" they stand up and say forward and backward.

STEP SEVEN. After K-State scores and before it kicks off, Willie will race onto the field or above the press box and lead the "KSU" chant. When K-State scores a touchdown Willie will be lifted into the air and start doing push-ups, one push-up for each point scored.

Large K-State following could lead Cats to Alliance Bowl game

It wasn't too long ago that K-State played its home football games in front of small crowds.

The crowds were so small that the Wildcats sold their home games against Oklahoma and traveled down to Norman instead so they could pick up a larger paycheck.

But that was when a win against North Texas stole headlines, and a win against Oklahoma was impossible.

Now, times are a little different. In the winless days, only a few thousand fans would show up to a game at KSU Stadium — if the weather was nice.

On Oct. 25, however, an estimated 10,000 fans braved rain and chilling wind and traveled to watch the Cats win at Oklahoma, 26-7.

"Today, our crowd was better than theirs," running back Eric Hickson said.

K-State fans packed their allotted sections at Oklahoma's Memorial Stadium, wearing purple and helping the players feel somewhat at home.

Although Cat fans were only a small percentage of the 68,433 on hand, they were loud enough to offset the Sooners' fans.

Oklahoma's fans made plenty of noise when K-State had the ball, making it difficult for quarterback Michael Bishop to hear. But K-State fans were just as loud when the "Lynch Mob," the Cats' defensive unit, was on the field, causing problems for Oklahoma's offense.

And on kickoffs, players on both teams encouraged the fans to stand up and make noise. The fans obliged, generating support for their teams. So which team was the benefactor of the loud crowd?

"You really couldn't tell," K-State middle linebacker Jeff Kelly said. "It was great."

Now Cat fans are roadtripping and backing the team, from 10,000 fans at a preseason game at Northern Illinois to 10,000 fans at a game against Oklahoma, a bitter conference rival. K-State is developing a reputation as a team with loyal followers.

The reputation took a large step forward in 1995 when the Cats played in the Holiday Bowl in San Diego. Many K-State fans thought the Cats were robbed of a Cotton Bowl bid. But 35,000 people made it out to California, filling Jack Murphy Stadium with purple.

Last season, the Cats earned their first bid in a New Year's Day bowl game when they were invited to play in the Cotton Bowl. To show their support, 45,000 fans made the trip to Dallas.

Perhaps that's why scouts from several bowls, including the Fiesta Bowl — an Alliance Bowl — came to K-State's Oct. 18 home game with Texas A&M.

They probably were impressed with the fans, who packed the stands, wore their purple, made enough noise to be heard in Topeka and stayed until the end of the game.

And the Cats didn't do too badly on the field, either. They kept the Aggies' No. 5-rated rushing attack to minus 35 yards and won the game 36-17.

So can the Cats, and their fans, make it to an Alliance Bowl? Only six teams will go — six of the best teams in the nation. Given its reputation for bringing fans, K-State could receive an invitation.

"It really will help us," Hickson said. "I don't know how the Bowl Committee does it, but I'm quite sure they want a lot of people traveling with the team. That's more money coming in for them. Our fans are a plus for us."

But the Cats will have to take care of business on the field first. They followed up their victory over Texas A&M with the win at Oklahoma and then limited Texas Tech to 117 yards of total offense in a 13-2 victory.

With seven wins on the season, a second-place standing in the conference and six bowl slots guaranteed to Big 12 teams, a fifth-consecutive K-State bowl appearance is a virtual lock. Now, it's just a matter of which bowl.

The Cats have three more tries to prove they're good enough to play in an Alliance game.

"We're not looking forward to just any old bowl game, we're looking forward to a Jan. 1 bowl," Hickson said.

They'll probably have to beat Kansas, Colorado and Iowa State to stand a legitimate chance. But if they do, they would be strong candidates for the Fiesta Bowl. The K-State basketball team is playing in a tournament in conjunction with the Fiesta Bowl, and organizers of both events would like packed stadiums.

However, the Big 10, Pacific 10 and Atlantic Coast conferences all have teams with strong records, and the Cats probably can't afford another loss.

"We know that if we win out, there's some good things ahead for us," wide receiver Gavin Peries said. "But we also know that each game we play is gonna be tough."

While the Cats know they need to focus on each opponent, they can't help but think of the possibilities. After all, K-State is 7-1, ranked No. 10 in the nation and on the brink of receiving an invitation to a prominent bowl game.

"It's definitely in the back of my mind. Everybody probably says they're not thinking about it, but it's in the back of everybody's minds," outside linebacker Travis Ochs said. "The fact is, it doesn't matter what we think about it, because someone else is going to do the deciding for us.

"The only thing we can do is win our games and give them the best record we can give them, and then they're going to make the decision," Ochs said. "It sounds boring, but you do have to take it week by week."

sixth in total offense, this contest is no contest. Bishop is 54-130-6 for 1,051 yards passing and has 391 rushing yards under his belt.

No. 2 Jonathan Beasley did a great job coming off the bench when Bishop was lagging Saturday in Lubbock, Texas, scoring a touchdown in the process.

Hawk starting play-caller Matt Johner broke a finger Oct. 4 and saw his first action since then last Saturday. Hawk sophomore backup Zac Wegner will see his fifth start this Saturday and has 44 completions on 94 passing attempts for 576 yards this season. Yawn. EDGE: CATS

RECEIVERS: Once a weakness for the Cats, the receivers have stepped up when necessary. Bishop's increased passing game has brought about the skills of receivers Darnell McDonald and Gavin Peries and tight end Justin Swift.

The Hawks' Michael Chandler has the most receptions, with 17 grabs (less than two a game) for 260 yards. He is followed by Eric Vann, a running back, hmm. EDGE: CATS

RUNNING BACKS: Vann will need to be contained, no question. Against Oklahoma, Vann posted a 99-yard touchdown run, the fifth player in NCAA history to do so. Vann ranks 11th in the Big 12 in rushing, but guess who's right above him? Cat back Eric Hickson. Mike Lawrence was on fire against Texas A&M, and don't forget Bishop's penchant for scrambling. EDGE: CATS

DEFENSIVE LINE/LBS: In this category, the Hawks are strong. With experience on their side, the Hawks have recorded 27 sacks so far, with linebacker Ron Warner responsible for 12.5 of them.

The Hawks are sixth in the Big 12, giving up 337 yards per game. Still, the Cats are second in the Big 12 and fifth in the nation. 'Nuff said. EDGE: CATS

SECONDARY: The Hawks boast being second in the Big 12 in pass defense, only giving up six touchdowns through the air this year.

And the Cats? No. 1 in the Big 12, No. 6 in the nation; the Cats have given up no aerial touchdowns in the past 30 quarters. EDGE: CATS

SPECIAL TEAMS: Cat punter James Garcia, the No. 12 punter in the nation, booted a 76-yarder vs. Mizzou. Garcia averages 44.89 yards on 35 punts (and he'll still have only 35 punts after the game today) . Punt returners Lamar Chapman and David Allen rank nationally in return yardage. Martin Gramatica's 14-of-15-field- goals, No. 4-in-the-nation status speaks for itself.

For the Hawks, Big 12 No. 2 kickoff returner David Winbush is questionable this weekend due to an ankle sprain. Hawk punter Dean Royal has had almost twice as much punting practice as Garcia, averaging 44.41 yards on 64 attempts. EDGE: CATS

Now, KU fans will retaliate. They will say I left KU because I was flunking out and K-State was the only school that would take me. Only I (and the registrar's office) know that's not true. They will say our mothers only have three teeth and we ride tractors to class. Only we know that's not true. You won't hear them saying anything about football, the subject at hand. And that's because they have nothing to say.

KU

Ohio and Bowling Green in its non-conference schedule this season.

And three directional schools — Western Michigan, Northern Illinois and Northeast Louisiana — are set to collect the gate receipts, get knocked off by a supposed football powerhouse and go back to their Mid-American, Midwestern Collegiate and Southland conference races.

Two of Kansas' three non-conference foes hail from conferences who at least have guaranteed slots in bowl games. And Jayhawk schedule-makers have dared to schedule a Big 10 team (gasp) in consecutive years during my college career and even agreed to meet Florida State this decade. They lost the game, but the Seminole shutout landed Jayhawks on national television wearing uniforms other than shorts and tank tops.

Now, neither football team can get on regional television with regularity unless Nebraska is the opponent.

Schedule strength is an important factor in football reputation. But football in the state of Kansas has a lot to overcome.

The defining moment in Kansas vs. K-State football was in 1987. A glory year for either program it was not. I was watching football on a Saturday afternoon with my dad and three brothers when ABC's John Saunders informed his national audience that Kansas and K-State had tied 17-17 in the "Battle of the Bads."

He said that on national television. And he was right. The Jayhawks finished the season 1-9-1 and the Wildcats were a winless 0-10-1. Unfortunately, a lot of folks think he still is right.

It takes a long time for people to forget that the two programs were so pathetic not so long ago.

But I guess the Wildcats, bound for another Cotton Bowl, will play host to the Holiday Bowl-bound Jayhawks on Saturday anyway.

Kansas 10, K-State 7 in overtime.

I can't wait for holiday vacations.

Peries

but that hasn't been the case yet.

His new medications, designed to prevent asthma attacks, have worked so far. He still has a problem with shortness of breath, but he's not worried.

"Being out of breath doesn't mean you're having an asthma attack," he said. "It just means you're struggling to breathe. It doesn't require you to use your inhaler. It's just part of having asthma."

Although Peries is getting used to it, he still has to be careful.

"You're struggling to get each breath," he said. "Everyone else can run around forever and be fine, but I can run 20 yards and be out of breath. A lot of times, it depends on if it's a real hot day, I struggle more. But now that it's cooling down, it's a little easier."

This year, he's happy with the arrival of fall. But last year, when he was fresh out of Southern California, he didn't take too kindly to the drop in temperature.

A cold day in Pasadena is 60 degrees, but here he learned that ice is more than something to put in a glass of soda.

"I remember walking to class thinking I wasn't gonna make it," he said. "It was tough, but like anything, you just get used to it."

Coming to play for the Cats wasn't something Peries always thought about. Actually, it wasn't something he ever thought about. He admits that when it came time to decide what university to transfer to, he hadn't ever heard of K-State.

But his recruiting adventure was a little different than most football players who end up playing for a top-15 program.

Most players receive letters and phone calls from coaches trying to sell their programs. However, Peries tried to sell himself to more than 30 programs by sending in highlight films, newspaper clippings and by making phone calls.

He heard from a handful of schools, including K-State, Kent State, Arizona State, Oregon State and Colorado State. While they considered him, he made sure to be fair and let them know he had asthma. He said the coaches were fair and gave him a chance.

K-State coach Bill Snyder was one of those coaches, and he wasn't worried about Peries being able to play for the Cats.

"If we thought it was going to impair his ability to play here, we would have given it a second thought," Snyder said. "But that wasn't the case. Based on past experiences, our guys have handled themselves fine and been able to play."

After redshirting last year, Peries is finally getting his chance to play this year. And so far, he's made the most of his opportunities. Along with being K-State's leading receiver, he's had his share of big catches.

Last week at Oklahoma, he had two clutch catches, one for 35 yards and one for a gain of 40. He also had one of K-State's most memorable catches when the Cats played Ohio on Sept. 13.

During that play, quarterback Michael Bishop was flushed from the pocket, rolled to the right sideline then back to the left, avoiding three sacks in the process. He finally threw the ball about 60 yards downfield while being hit, where wide receiver Everett Burnett deflected the pass and Peries caught it while falling face-first at Ohio's 3-yard line.

The play was one of many this season in which Peries had to adjust to Bishop's scrambling abilities, only to fight for breath once the whistle blew. But he said it's not a problem.

"We know we have to be prepared for anything," Peries said of Bishop. "You never know what he can do. He's capable of doing amazing things."

Not that Peries' catch wasn't amazing. If he didn't come down with the ball, that play would have been just another incomplete downfield pass.

Plays like that get Peries' attention — attention he loves, considering he's playing for the No. 12 team in the country.

"This is such a big university, and I cherish everything that happens to me here," he said. "So I try and keep a little scrapbook."

Historically, the Sooners have had K-State's number. But not in this decade, perhaps one of the reasons Kelly wears purple, not crimson.

Kelly's not worried about any traditions, though. He's just happy the Cats improved to 6-1 on the season, and that he'll never have to play in Oklahoma again — unless the teams meet in the Big 12 Championship game next year.

"With all the bickering going on about where I was going to school, at K-State or OU, it was a great personal win for me," he said.

He was also happy with his decision to play for the Cats. Now that he's seen, and heard, the fans in Norman, he's glad he plays his home games at KSU Stadium.

"Nothing compares to the fans in Manhattan," he said.

Athletic director explains stadium expansion fee to group

GROWING PAINS

Getting confused yet?
Wednesday's Collegian will have a special wrap-around section with information students will need before going to vote next week.
Past articles can be found on the eCollegian at collegian.ksu.edu/links/stadium.html.

JOHN HENDERSON
senior staff writer

K-State's Director of Intercollegiate Athletics told a group of students concerned with the plan to fund part of the football stadium expansion with student fees he'd understand if they didn't want to support it.

The referendum that goes to student body vote on Nov. 17 and 18 is to give students the opportunity to help out, Athletic Director Max Urick said.

"The fact of the matter is," he said, "I need student help to get this done in the manner I think it should be done."

Students for First Things First, which organized the meeting Sunday afternoon in Union 209, voiced their confusion and concern. Rob MacDougall Jr., junior in political science, said one of the more basic concerns was the hype in the absence of real information from the athletic department.

"If it's so great, then why do they have to go through so much to convince us?" MacDougall asked.

Rob MacDougall Sr., senior in social work, began the meeting by thanking Urick for attending and emphasized there should be no animosity in the room. About 20 people were in attendance.

"As a group, we are not against the expansion," he said. "What we are against is the grab for our money."

Urick began by outlining the scenario that he would like best. First, 7,000 new seats would be added to the 39,200 already in KSU Stadium. The project would involve extending the upper deck on the east side of the stadium farther up and to the east, and around the northeast corner.

Urick estimated it would cost $11 million, based on counsel with architects and a cost consultant. To service a $20 million bond, he would need a plan to guarantee $1.4 million a year for 15 years.

Urick cited four sources of income — stadium parking which earns $50,000 a year; 1,200 new chair back seats, which earn $750 apiece per year; 24 new donor suites at $24,000 a year and student fees.

The chair backs take up twice as much space as bench seating, but would be placed in a prime location on the upper deck. Urick said that it would be reasonable to expect that 75 percent of the chair backs and suites would be sold.

The chair backs would earn $675,000 a year, and the suites would earn $432,000 a year. Urick said he already had 21 on a waiting list for the suites.

That leaves student privilege fees, which are paid at the beginning of each semester. Urick said $400,000 would be available to pay the debt for the expansion if full-time students paid $24 more in privilege fees a year.

As an incentive, Urick said the department would reserve 2,500 of the new seats for K-State students, which would bring the number of currently reserved student seats to 10,000.

Alternately, Urick said students could pay $12 a year and receive 1,500 new seats, a total of 9,000.

Student fees are important, Urick said, because they're more stable as a source of income than, for example, ticket sales. At most, students would pay $6 million over 15 years, he said.

"I don't expect students to pay for all of this," he said.

MacDougall Jr. said he wondered why the athletic department hadn't made more

"EVERYONE WAS JUST KIND OF FROZEN. IT JUST LOOKED LIKE THIS DEER JUST ROLLED THROUGH THE WINDOW."
MAGGIE KEATING, SENIOR IN POLITICAL SCIENCE

ABOUT 15 MINUTES after being shot with a tranquilizer, the sedated deer, which jumped through a glass window, lies on the floor with lacerations on its left chest and left hind leg. Staff from the Veterinary Medicine Teaching Hospital gather around the deer to assess the situation.

The buck stops here — in Waters Hall

▶ CONFUSED DEER JUMPS THROUGH class window.

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Students in a Waters Hall classroom were unexpectedly joined by a new classmate Friday morning when a panic-stricken buck leapt through a plate-glass window.

The students were listening to a lecture for their 11:30 a.m. International Relations class in Waters 41, a classroom facing the courtyard between the north facade of Waters and the Waters annex.

"All of a sudden, we just heard this crash," Maggie Keating, senior in political science, said. "Everyone was just kind of frozen. It just looked like this deer just rolled through the window."

Keating said the class was directed to get out by fellow classmate Tim Schrag, who happens to be a K-State police officer and was willing to take charge of the situation.

Schrag, who is from western Kansas and has dealt with similar situations, said he was mainly worried the deer would knock someone down and begin to kick them with its sharp hooves.

"That deer was obviously freaked to jump through a window like that," Schrag said. "I could see it was injured and really scared."

The buck's journey to Waters began when it was spotted by a student while it wandered around the adjacent feed mill garage. The student, who did not wish to be identified, chased the buck, trying to run it off away from campus. Instead, the buck lit off for the labyrinth of alleys and courtyards behind Waters.

Once there, the student said he saw the buck jump through a door window and then re-emerge. It then ran into the pedestrian courtyard, where it jumped into the classroom.

Schrag said the buck did try to get back out the window, but the slick linoleum prevented it from planting its hooves.

After the class was vacated and Schrag had called the police on his cellular phone, staff from the Veterinary Medicine Teaching Hospital arrived on the scene to tranquilize

Forum addresses library funding for periodicals

LESLIE NACHTRAB
staff reporter

Faculty, students and administration brought questions and mixed emotions to the Union Little Theatre Friday.

They met in forum to hear and discuss the final report given by the Task Force to Plan for Financing the Library of the Twenty-First Century. The 26-page report lists the task force's recommendations for funding the inflationary prices of periodical subscriptions.

The forum resulted in many being skeptical of the long-term recommendations proposed by the task force.

Cynthia McCahon, task force chair, highlighted the proposal and then opened the remaining time to audience questions.

The long-term recommendations were the greatest concern for those in attendance. The recommendations were for a $2-per-credit-hour fee for students, $10 million from the KSU Foundation and support from the state of Kansas.

McCahon said each one of the recommendations would cover the cost of inflationary subscription prices, but she said this was the university's chance to make the library even better by implementing all three.

"Each one will separately take care of the problem," McCahon said. "But we've got this beautiful, new building. Why don't we be proud of its content, too. By using all three, we have a terrific potential of getting out of the bottom of the Big 12."

Michael Ossar, head of the Department of Modern Languages, said he thought it was unlikely all three of the recommendations would carry through.

"It seems to me that all three parts of your long-range plan are all kind of problematic," Ossar said. "It would be kind of a miracle if things work out the way they're planned."

Ossar raised the possibility that students, the Foundation and the state might decide they are more interested in a stadium expansion or a new alumni center and don't want the responsibility of paying for a better library.

McCahon said for that reason, it was imperative for each funding resource to realize the importance of the library.

"We need to work with the students to come up with a plan where they feel they benefit from an improved library," she said. "It's a fallacy to think that just graduates and faculty use the library."

David Mrozek, professor of history, said he was worried about the rising cost of attending K-State the proposals would bring.

"I really am sincerely on the positive side of supporting the library,"

7 K-Staters to compete in nationwide contest

KERRY BOYDSTON
staff reporter

Seven K-State students will be front and center this week at the American Royal Livestock, Horse Show and Rodeo as they compete to be named American Royal ambassador.

"Luckily, we have seven of the 32 finalists here at K-State," Jake Worcester, ambassador candidate, said. "That's pretty impressive, considering this is a nationwide contest."

The ambassador finalists were selected based on a written application. The winners will be announced Thursday evening.

"From here on, we have interviews that will focus on issues like what we think our future in agriculture will be, how will we promote the American Royal and even basic personal skills," Worcester said.

"The judges will select one male and one female who they feel have the ability and desire to give back to the agricultural industry," he said.

Once selected, ambassadors will attend events on behalf of the American Royal.

"The ambassadors will represent the Royal for one year," Suzanne Goering, ambassador candidate, said. "They will have to remain in Kansas City for a while after the Royal to talk to civic groups, schools and even radio and television stations."

In addition to their duties as ambassadors, the finalists each receive a $500 scholarship.

"The scholarship jumps to $5,000 if you are selected as American Royal ambassador," Worcester said.

"That would be really nice, but I'm going in with the attitude if it happens, it happens. It is going to be so exciting because it is all about the Iraq turns back U.N. inspectors, sends top official to New York

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Iraqi President Saddam Hussein declared Sunday that his country had to choose between sacrifice or slavery, suggesting that a confrontation with the United States might be inevitable.

His strident comments came as Iraq barred U.N. weapon inspection teams that included Americans for a seventh day and sent its deputy prime minister to argue its case before the U.N. Security Council.

More ominously, the statement came as Iraq threatened to shoot down an American U-2 spy plane scheduled to resume flights over the country as early as Monday.

Iraq has "been put in a position where it has to choose either to live honorably and with dignity or to face all the possibilities," Hussein said in a statement on Iraqi television, carried also by the British Broadcasting Corp.

As a showdown over Iraq loomed, there were few signs that the crisis was about to be resolved.

In New York, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan met with three envoys who tried unsuccessfully to convince Hussein to rescind his order for American weapons inspectors to leave.

"We offered Iraq a ladder to climb down from the precipice they've got on to," Annan said. "And they've not yet done that."

Annan is expected to meet Monday with Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz for one last attempt to resolve the crisis before the Security Council takes up the issue in the afternoon.

Meanwhile, Hussein insisted that films of the U.N. inspection teams' activities showed "how much material and psychological harm the people of Iraq have endured.

"This path, however, has not led us to any result, and there is not the least hope that it will lead us to any result."

"We have to choose between sacrifice or slavery," he added.

But, as Iraqi officials have repeatedly done in the past, Hussein said a confrontation could be avoided if Iraq was provided an alternative that is specific, clear and concrete.

Court reinstates Kansan's lawsuit against 'Power Rangers' creators

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — More than two years after it was dismissed, a Kansas man's lawsuit against the creators of the "Mighty Morphin Power Rangers" has been reinstated by the federal appeals court in California.

In the mid-1980s, Herb Simmons, a former FBI agent, created what he called "Star Patrol," a multiracial group of four teen-agers who transform themselves into superheroes in brightly colored, futuristic uniforms.

He went on to create books and marketing tools for Star Patrol and recruited young people in the Kansas City area to make Star Patrol visits to local schools, spreading pro-health and anti-drug messages.

Simmons said that in 1991 and 1992, he pitched the Star Patrol to the Fox television network, but he could not line up the financing.

The Mighty Morphin Power Rangers exploded across America in 1993. The Fox show has spawned two feature films and a separate industry of toys and apparel.

U.S. District Judge Manuel L. Real dismissed the lawsuit in August 1995, and Simmons appealed. Last month, a three-judge panel of the 9th Circuit reinstated the lawsuit.

Dodge City takes offense at slurs published in Esquire magazine

DODGE CITY, Kan. — Esquire magazine isn't widely read here. Now, it's impossible to find at the newsstand.

Some say the Dodge City Chamber of Commerce bought up all the available copies of the November issue because of an article that portrays race relations in an unflattering light.

The article by Michael Paterniti infers there is resentment between whites in the western Kansas city and a growing Asian-American population.

The article infers that whites are resentful of the Asian-Americans, who have migrated to Dodge City to take jobs in the slaughterhouses, for taking their jobs, although many whites find the slaughterhouse work distasteful.

Chamber president John Campbell denies buying up the magazine, but admits he didn't like the tone of the article.

Man being taken to hospital dies following ambulance accident

LAWRENCE — An 80-year-old Baldwin man died after the ambulance taking him to the hospital collided with a bull on the highway and overturned.

The man was identified as Orvil E. Fisher. Authorities declined to say why the ambulance was called, citing patient confidentiality rules, and it was not known if he died of his medical condition or of injuries suffered in the accident.

Three medics in the ambulance were treated and released from hospitals for their injuries.

The ambulance collided with the bull on U.S. Highway 59 about seven miles south of Lawrence.

Mistaken federal marshal shoots candy-bar toting teen-ager

NEW YORK — A federal marshal shot a teen-ager walking down the street eating a Three Musketeers candy bar after reportedly mistaking the silver wrapper for a gun.

Andre Burgess, 17, was in fair condition with a leg wound Saturday at Jamaica Hospital.

"You can't even walk down the street and eat a candy bar anymore," Burgess said.

The Queens district attorney and the U.S. Marshals Service are investigating the shooting, representatives of each agency said on Saturday.

Deputy U.S. Marshal William Cannon was put on leave with pay after the shooting, Marshal Service spokesman Dave Branham said Saturday in an interview from Washington, D.C.

Cat killers awaiting sentencing

BLOOMFIELD, Iowa — Two young men who admitted breaking into an animal shelter and beating 16 cats to death with baseball bats were convicted of only misdemeanors Friday after the jury concluded the strays were worth no more than $31.25 each.

Chad Lamansky and Daniel Myers, both 18, could get up to five years in prison and $750 in fines.

The jury took two hours to find the men guilty of offenses against an animal shelter and criminal trespass.

But the jury found that the value of the dead cats did not exceed $500, thus ruling out felony convictions that would have carried up to 10 years behind bars and a $15,000 fine.

Group to sponsor conference about democracy in Congo, provide forum for grievances against U.S., United Nations

BRYON VOGEL
staff reporter

As the Congo struggles to recover from decades of misrule, K-State's Congolese student organization is changing its focus to gain support in America.

The Congolese Students and Scholars of North America, an organization active on U.S. college campuses including K-State, has scheduled a conference on the reconstruction of the Congo. The group, which includes about 25 students, faculty and Manhattan residents, will meet at 1 p.m. Thursday in the Union Big 12 Room.

Formerly Zaire, Congo faces economic ruin and $14 billion in foreign debt after years of corruption and neglect by ousted dictator Mobutu Sese Seko.

Mobutu, who came to power in 1965, was toppled by rebel leader Laurent Kabila on May 17 after a 7 rebellion. Mobutu fled when the first rebel troops entered the capital city of Kinshasa.

When Kabila took over as the country's head of state, he also inherited a basic infrastructure left in tatters. While its population had tripled during Mobutu's reign, Zaire's per capita gross domestic product had shrunk by 40 percent.

Stephan Tubane, a former group president who now helps coordinate the group's activities, said Thursday's conference will serve a number of purposes, including a shift of emphasis.

"We are in the process of restructuring our organization," Tubane said. "Before Mobutu went into exile, our main focus was to educate the community about democracy and how the United States was involved in keeping Mobutu in power in Kinshasa.

"We were trying to educate as many people as possible so we could end the war of destruction. Our main focus now is trying to get international organizations involved in the rebuilding and reconstruction of Congo," he said.

Tubane said the conference will also provide a forum for grievances against the United States and the United Nations, which were criticized for insisting on a rebel cease-fire in favor of an election that would peacefully ease Mobutu from power.

"We want to petition the federal government to let them know we don't approve anymore of what they did before by keeping Mobutu in power. We want them to reverse that position and promote democracy," Tubane said.

On Feb. 22, after the endorsement of a U.N. Security Council peace plan, U.S. officials agreed the rebel advance in Zaire needed to be halted. The rebels refused to agree on a cease-fire until Mobutu would resign and return Zaire to democratic rule.

Construction team takes 1st in district competition

SARA MARTIN
staff writer

The Associated General Contractors put their knowledge to the test at Regional Construction Jeopardy, placing first in the upper Midwest district and proving they know their stuff.

A team of four including Will Kennedy, Tyler Buford, Jeff Kleinschmidt and Michael Knight, all seniors in construction science and management, participated using their knowledge of construction estimating, safety, structural design and analysis and general definitions.

"We hardly did any prep at all," Knight said. "You know it's about construction, but you don't know what it's going to be. On a team of four, hopefully someone has the answer."

Kennedy, also a member on last year's winning team, said he agreed. He said the team contributes its success to the broad base of knowledge of each member from their different field concentrations.

"We're one of the top teams in the region," Kennedy said. "It's fun to know that other schools get pumped to play us."

Associated General Contractors is the K-State chapter of construction science and management majors. Seventy percent of majors are now active in the chapter. Each month, all of the majors meet in a required seminar to bring in construction-related speakers. At these seminars, the chapter recruits new members by updating all the majors on field trips and current community projects.

Involvement within local communities is a large part of chapter projects. Their recent work has included building a greenhouse for a nursing home in Wamego, community playground construction, nature trails, handicap ramps for churches, Sunset Zoo projects, Head Start building construction and Adopt a Highway.

"The greenhouse was one of our larger projects with over 100 man-hours," Kennedy said. "It was a great service to them, because without our labor, they never would have been able to fund the whole project."

Not only do the projects help locally, members get a chance to be involved in their field.

"This provides opportunities for students who haven't had experience in the industry," said David Fritchen, assistant professor of architectural engineering and construction science and AGC adviser. "Some have never been on a construction site. When we take on a project, we encourage those who have no experience to go out there and get involved."

Michael Knight, AGC president, is now working on getting a new project called Junior Achievement up and running. The program is aimed at second to sixth grades to educate children about different aspects of construction.

AGC of Kansas Inc., the chapter sponsor and co-sponsor of the regionals trip, has already approved the necessary funds and purchased the project materials. All that is left is to recruit chapter volunteers to run the program in the schools. This will be done at the next construction seminar.

"Junior Achievement will educate kids that construction is not all rough and tumble," Knight said. "This is so they won't develop prejudice against the construction industry about being rough guys with no education. There is going to be a trade shortage in the future, and getting these kids interested and respecting the industry is essential."

However, Knight, along with several others, said that it is not only children who perceive the negative image of construction. They think people don't understand the field, and possibly Junior Achievement can help educate parents as well.

"There is a small percentage of beer-drinking, pot-bellied, cussing workers who give us our image. That's only a small part," Knight said.

"Construction managers almost always have a college degree. They do estimates and keep costs under control to make sure the company earns a profit. We do the managing, not the execution."

Not only will Junior Achievement reap the benefits of altered perceptions, it helps the chapter members in their day-to-day workings as well.

"It'll teach presentation skills to members," said Knight. "It will teach us to facilitate people like we'll have to in the business."

Safety precautions to prepare students for winter blues

When you climb out of your steamy shower in the morning only to have icicles form on your body as soon as you hit the sink, it's time welcome Old Man Winter back into your life.

For centuries, humans have battled this frosty visitor. And because it's a little unkosher to slaughter a buffalo to keep warm, we must turn to alternate sources of comfort. From auto to torso, here's a checklist of things to be aware of this winter.

❑ Sweaters. Pants. Let these items replace shorts and tube tops.

❑ Check fluids in your car.

❑ Stock car with necessary roadside-emergency items like flares, blankets, flashlights and jumper cables.

❑ Keep an ice scraper handy.

❑ Make sure Rover and Mittens have adequate food, shelter and warmth.

❑ Get a cozy hat. Just because you have pants on doesn't mean you'll be 100-percent toasty.

❑ Heaters can make the humidity in your place of residence drop as low as 5 percent. That's just like the Sahara Desert! Have lots o' lotion and a few humidifiers on hand.

❑ If you're using a space heater, two words: Be careful.

❑ If you have a fireplace, be sure the chimney is cleaned before you fire up the ol' Yule log. You never know what kind of jolly old men can get stuck in there throughout the year.

❑ Hot chocolate tastes good. Get a canister.

Once you're able to check everything off on this list, you won't even notice when school's not canceled, despite 20 feet of snow.

What is the pri¢e of a person?
Adults seem to be valued more than children

How many dead babies does it take to equal one president of the United States? Quite a few, with the way the justice system works.

It is a fact in this country that some people are worth more than others. Although we like to talk about children being our future, we all know children just aren't worth as much as grown-ups.

VIEWPOINT

MARY RENEE SMITH

MARY RENEE SMITH is a sophomore in speech. You can send e-mail to Mary at mojo@ksu.edu.

If you were to assassinate the president, you would go to jail for the rest of your life. Do not pass go, do not collect $200. A cold, dark cell in a federal penitentiary and a movie of the week.

However, if you kill a small child, you could get a few years in jail. If you kill your own child, you might even get off with a few months and time served, or maybe just probation. In Thursday's Collegian there was an Associated Press news brief about a father who killed his infant son and received probation.

That's it — probation. This guy got up in the middle of the night and shook his 3-month-old son because the child wouldn't stop crying. Imagine that — a baby who cries in the middle of the night. Then the man put his son back in bed, and in the morning the child was dead.

Eric J. Coffey pleaded guilty to killing a helpless child, and the judge sentenced him to probation and told him to attend classes on anger control and parenting. Like this guy should ever be allowed to be a parent again.

What the hell is this? Kill all you want, you can make more? It makes me so angry I don't even know where to begin.

Imagine you are standing in line at the supermarket and a child in line behind you is crying. So you grab the child out the shopping cart and shake the little one to death. You would be put away for a very long time. But kill your own flesh and blood, and you can be home in time for dinner.

There's a strange logic involved there. You would think you should get a longer sentence for killing something you are by the laws of nature supposed to protect. But instead there is an attitude of "it's yours, so do what you will."

The tragedy of the Oklahoma City bombing is the 19 innocent children who were killed. Like there is such a thing as a non-innocent child. So many of the photos from that day at the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building are of twisted tricycles, blackened toys and little shoes. The image of the firefighter carrying a charred, lifeless little body is etched in our minds forever.

But Timothy McVeigh isn't going to the chair for blowing up children. Blowing up children is not a federal crime. Blowing up a federal building or killing a federal employee is a federal crime.

Every child killed in this country could have grown up to be a federal employee or president someday.

I have some problems with this inequality between the value of grown-ups and children. Children are cute, innocent and trusting. Adults, well, aren't. Children cannot defend themselves. Adults can. I have never met a child I didn't like.

Punishment for crime in this country is really ironic. If you kill something defenseless, you get off easier. Killing a helpless baby is so much easier than dodging Secret Service agents to get to the president or packing a rental truck full of explosives.

Someone tried to explain the logic behind lighter sentences for baby killers by saying it is easier to kill a child on accident. Nobody could pick up the president and shake him to death, but it would be easy to accidentally shake a baby to death. Huh?

I was a young mother. I remember those nights when the baby just seemed to cry and cry and cry. I had to on occasion put the infant in the crib and go outside alone in the middle of the night to get away from the high-pitched cry. I have stood over the crib and cried myself because I didn't know what to do to make the baby stop crying.

I look at my children and think about how special they are. I remember how precious they were as infants. I watch the children at the playground and wonder about what they will be when they grow up.

I never realized they had to wait until they were grown-up before they had any value.

America's school system should focus on education, not graduation

If you want a Nobel Prize, pay attention.

My microeconomics professor would suggest that you become an economist. After all, it's the only social science that can produce Nobel laureates.

Of course, we can't all become economists. With such a low demand for the profession, a huge supply would overwhelm the market and drop wages. See, I do listen in class.

VIEWPOINT

CHRISTOPHER McLEMORE

CHRIS McLEMORE is a sophomore in political science and speech. You can send e-mail to Chris at clm1182@ksu.edu.

So how do we become Nobel winners? We could quit school and devote our lives to the promotion of world peace, or we could be more practical. We can refocus our views on public education. It seems that educational status quo is lacking in many areas. Current trends in schools are leading us down a path of trouble.

Too much time is put into seeing every student in a cap and gown, and not enough time is put into student learning. It is time we begin to emphasize education, not graduation.

The big press in schools is now on getting students to graduate. I'm not talking about the collegiate level. I've known many professors who were more than willing to fail students and do so with a smile.

The same story can't be told for secondary schools. One of my esteemed high-school English teachers is a case in point. She would give students extra credit for coming in during study hall and cleaning her windows. I'm glad Johnny got an A in her class because he could work wonders with the Windex. He should hold on to that skill, because I'm sure he'll be using it in the future.

The emphasis is clearly not on getting students to learn.

Additionally, student requirements are far more lax than they used to be. The United States has the lowest ranked eighth-grade students enrolled in algebra compared to other industrialized countries. We have bowed to the complaints of students and wary parents. Take the power out of the hands of the PTA, and put it into the hands of those who will create rigorous requirements.

While this distorted focus is a big problem, the current trends to fix education are flawed as well.

SHANE FOSBURG/Collegian

Standardized national tests are not the answer to our educational woes. Who needs a yardstick to measure how bad off students are? Indeed, language or vocabulary exams measure acquired reality in English. However, we shouldn't just prepare students to meet the goals prescribed by a national test. We should constantly focus on pushing those students to achieve excellence.

Test numbers do not create knowledge. They measure it. If I knew that everyone in a room was less than 4 feet tall, and I brought in a tape measure, it would not make anyone taller. We must work for educating the youth and not merely measuring them.

We also need to de-emphasize the role computers play in schools. As my good friend Aaron Breitenbach would say, these technology gods should not be so readily worshiped. Computers should not consume education — they should be tools to supplement education. We would have been in big trouble if the Chinese abacus had been the main focus of our classroom experiences. It was a great innovation at one time, but it is now out of date and overshadowed. (Besides, have you ever tried to solve square roots on an abacus? Thank God for Texas Instruments.)

Preparing today's youth with today's computers does not ensure that they will prosper in the future.

However, there is hope for our failing schools. Several summers ago, I met a student by the name of Robert Frost (no relation). Robert was a student at the Bronx High School of Science. This prestigious high school has graduated more Nobel Prize winners than any other secondary school in the world.

He explained (between verses of "Wild Grapes") that the reason for their success was threefold. They had a rigorous class schedule, they had teachers who focused on educating the students and they had little incentive to skip class. After all, where are you going to go in the middle of the Bronx? Boy howdy, imagine that.

They focus on creating knowledgeable students, and they end up with highly successful and highly influential graduates. Somebody write that down.

Getting education back to the basics can greatly increase scholastic aptitude.

We can have successful students without sending them to the Bronx. We just need to provide them the correct tools and maybe a trip to Queens.

We need to rethink how we are educating our youth. We need to change the system. Our noble efforts can possibly reap Nobel rewards.

SHAC chairwoman clarifies points in Collegian article

Editor,

I am writing to clarify a few points made in Thursday's article "SHAC examines 3 budget plans for Lafene, counseling services."

First, the Student Health Advisory Committee was asked to examine the budgets of Lafene Health Center and University Counseling Services with respect to three options for the Student health fee: a 5- to 10-percent increase, no change or a 5-percent decrease.

Lafene might face the loss of one physician if the health fee were to remain stable or to increase by less than 8 percent. This level of increase in the health fee would generate only a 3- to 4-percent increase in the overall budget of Lafene.

Second, 97 percent of the portion of the health fee distributed to Counseling Services (54 percent of Counseling Services' budget) is used for salaries and benefits. Counseling Services meets its remaining salaries and operating expenses from state funds (41 percent of the budget), testing/counseling fees (3 percent of the budget) and external grants (2 percent of the budget).

This comment was made in context — salaries and benefits for both Counseling Services and Lafene staff are not determined locally — they are set by the state of Kansas.

Lafene and Counseling Services are separate entities that share one building. In the past, the health fee was determined for a unified Lafene budget. However, to help clarify for students the amount and destinations of their privilege fees, Lafene and budgets are being evaluated separately for this year's fee review.

Lafene is funded 100 percent by students — two-thirds by our privilege fees and one-third by fees collected for services rendered at the health center.

Lafene truly is a student-sponsored service that is used by the majority of the student community. During 1996-97, more than 12,000 different students used services offered by Lafene — almost 60,000 total visits were accommodated.

K-State students should be proud that we are able to maintain on campus a first-rate, accredited health center that offers affordable services to all students.

Professor said headline misleading in cattle story

Editor,

Last Wednesday, an Associated Press article with the headline "Meat processing plants struggle to slaughter cattle killed in blizzard before they begin to decompose" is in error.

You can not slaughter a dead animal and meat processors do not accept dead cattle — only rendering plants do. National Byproducts is a renderer and their products are not hamburger or the next steak you eat.

As stated in the body of the article, hides and dog food are just two of the products that will be produced from the cattle killed in the blizzard. Consumers are rightly concerned with the safety of their food supply, and so are meat processors, therefore it is important to structure headlines to accurately reflect the content of an article.

Student thinks drinking laws need to be enforced

Editor,

I'm a 19-year-old sophomore. I don't drink, but I see a potential problem not with those who drink, but with those who drink illegally.

I understand alcohol is permitted in certain areas on campus for special events. However, there is underage drinking in the residence halls, which might be because there are students of legal-drinking age in the same hall.

A story published in the Oct. 15 Collegian was about an 18-year-old MIT student who died of alcohol poisoning. Maybe this could have been prevented if the legal-drinking age had been better enforced in Massachusetts.

Maybe we can enforce the law here in Kansas, specifically in Manhattan, before something like that happens to one of our classmates.

Hiring freeze inhibits students' education

Editor,

I am concerned over the recent hiring freeze the provost has implemented. There have been departments that have had to stop national searches for faculty. With the freeze, faculty who will be retiring will not be replaced.

Without faculty to teach classes, graduation will become difficult for many students. It seems ridiculous to continue at this university when two or three semesters are added to one's college career because of a lack of faculty. The hiring freeze needs to be lifted. Our classes are too important to lose faculty over equipment.

Fraternity members camp to collect donations

ZACH VADER
staff reporter

The Alpha Tau Omega fraternity recently received six national awards, and members of the fraternity are helping the Flint Hills Breadbasket this week.

Chris Coad, Brad Deener, Chad Russell and Gavin Vaughn are camping out in sororities' yards for 11 days for donations to send to the charity.

Vaughn, junior in biology, said it was not a philanthropy.

"This is not like your everyday fraternity philanthropy," Vaughn said. "A few of us were just sitting around one day and thought it would be a good idea."

Vaughn said they were camping out for 11 days because there are 11 sororities. The men estimate they will receive $100 in donations from each house.

Coad, senior in criminology, said the men will endure harsh conditions during the 11 days.

"We are not allowed to go back to the house for anything," Coad said. "Homeless people don't have a place to go, so we brought everything we needed for this. It should be fun for a good cause."

The journey for the men started last Thursday at the Gamma Phi Beta house and will continue into the weekend.

"We think this was a great idea," Coad said. "The Flint Hills Breadbasket is a great organization, and we thought this was a great way to show them our support."

Kristen Hedberg, junior in elementary education and philanthropy chair for the Gamma Phi's, said her house thought this was a great way to raise money.

"They were over at our house the first day," Hedberg said. "They looked cold, but they are doing it for a very worthy cause, and we were glad to help."

Tension builds as ruling nears in conviction of British au pair

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. — Almost everyone seems to have an opinion about Louise Woodward.

The case of the 19-year-old British au pair, who is serving a life sentence for murdering a baby in her care, has inspired lawmakers to action and driven homemakers to protest.

Over dinner tables, on television and at the supermarket, people have taken sides. Did she kill Matthew Eappen? Was she treated too harshly? Everyone has had their say.

Everyone, that is, but the one person whose word carries the weight of the law behind it — the judge who has held her immediate fate in his hands for five days.

Superior Court Judge Hiller B. Zobel's ruling on whether Woodward's second-degree murder conviction stands or falls was expected as early as Monday.

Zobel was faced with four choices: He could leave Woodward's murder conviction untouched, reduce it to manslaughter, order a new trial or acquit her.

No matter what his decision, it will almost surely be appealed.

A jury convicted Woodward Oct. 30 of killing 8-month-old Matthew by shaking him and slamming his head against a hard object in February.

The verdict carried an automatic sentence of life in prison, with the earliest possibility of parole in 15 years.

Woodward, the baby and his 2 1/2-year-old brother were alone in the Eappens' suburban home the day she called for help, saying the baby was having trouble breathing.

Paramedics and doctors who treated the baby at Children's Hospital indicated he had been abused. After he was taken off life support five days later, an autopsy report blamed his death on shaken infant syndrome.

Woodward's three-week trial was largely a duel between medical experts. Those called by the prosecution remained firm in their contentions that a deliberate, violent action caused Matthew's injuries. Those called by the defense testified that he died after a three-week-old head injury began to bleed again.

Woodward herself took the stand to deny she did anything to harm the child. Her lawyers, led by former O.J. Simpson defender Barry Scheck, were so convinced she would be acquitted that they successfully petitioned the judge to remove manslaughter as an option for the jurors to consider.

As the trial became daily television fare in America and in England, many people came to believe Woodward. More were swayed when the jury found her guilty.

Others, however, were outraged by backlash against the Eappens. Dr. Deborah Eappen, the boy's mother, was harshly criticized for choosing to work three days a week instead of staying home full time with her children. Both parents are physicians and some felt they should have hired a professional nanny instead of a less-expensive au pair, a young woman who visits the United States on a cultural exchange.

The case has had a widespread effect. A Massachusetts legislator who supported reinstating the death penalty changed his vote last week, causing a tie that effectively defeated the measure. He cited the Woodward verdict as the reason, saying it showed that not all verdicts were clear-cut.

Congressmen said parents' concern over child care, intensified by Woodward's conviction, could fuel efforts to pass a broad child-care bill next year.

Woodward sympathizers, as well as people who support the verdict, have held vigils almost without interruption outside the courthouse where she was convicted. Britons have demonstrated at the U.S. Embassy in London.

Model of solar system honors astronomer Sagan

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ITHACA, N.Y. — In Carl Sagan's solar system, it takes just 21 steps to get from the sun to Mercury, 47 steps to Earth. Pluto is a 10-minute walk away.

At a normal stride, a person would be moving about four times the speed of light — relatively speaking — and would have to walk halfway around the world to reach the nearest star.

In honor of the man who brought the marvels of the heavens to millions who watched his TV series "Cosmos," a scale model of the solar system was unveiled Saturday, the eve of his birthday. The model stretches more than three-quarters of a mile through downtown Ithaca, where the late astronomer and physicist lived and taught at Cornell University.

Six-foot-high stone obelisks stand over a 10-block area to denote the sun and nine planets — accurately spaced on a scale of one to five billion.

"(Sagan) often conjured models of the cosmos. He often worked to help us come to know how big things are beyond our fragile sphere," said Bill Nye, a former student of Sagan's who hosts the popular children's science series "Bill Nye The Science Guy" on public television.

"He changed us in the way we think," Nye told more than 800 people gathered to dedicate the Carl Sagan Planet Walk.

"I know Carl would love this," said Ann Druyan, Sagan's widow and longtime collaborator. "By walking through it, we can bring ourselves to face our true circumstances in the universe, that we are part of the fabric of nature, not the center."

Ithaca artist Erin Caruth designed the monument, drawing inspiration from stone celestial monuments of earlier civilizations such as Stonehenge. Each obelisk carries color spacecraft images of the planet it represents on porcelain enamel signs, descriptions of the planet's unusual features and a model that shows the planet's size compared with the sun. The sun and Pluto are blue-pearl granite; the rest are concrete.

Sagan was probably best known for his acclaimed 13-part PBS series "Cosmos," co-written with Druyan, which retraced 15 billion years of cosmic evolution.

A NASA adviser, Sagan won the Pulitzer Prize for general nonfiction in 1978 for "The Dragons of Eden: Speculations on the Evolution of Human Intelligence." His 1985 best-selling novel, "Contact," was made into a movie this year.

Jury finds police officers responsible for youth's suicide

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MILFORD, Conn. — Four police officers did not do enough to prevent a 13-year-old boy distraught over a poor report card from committing suicide, a jury said.

Jurors sided with Gregory Brown's parents, who claimed the officers should have called them before leaving the Brown home after talking with their son.

When Gregory's father, Douglas, returned home later, he found his son had killed himself using a shotgun he thought had been locked and hidden away.

A hearing on the family's claim for at least $1 million was scheduled for Wednesday. The city's insurance carrier will pay any damages.

"Given the totality of the circumstances, how could the officers leave him alone?" said Norman A. Pattis, an attorney who represented the Brown family. "At a minimum, they needed to call the parents or some responsible adult. Don't just take it at face value what a 13-year-old boy tells you."

Defense attorney Thomas Barrett, who represented Detective Patrick Dooling, Lt. Henry Povinelli and retired Officers Edward O'Keefe and Frank Hosey, declined to comment.

Legal experts said the jury's decision was unusual because municipal agencies are generally found to be immune from such lawsuits unless a particular action directly caused death or injury.

"This should be a hard case to win because I don't think every time terrible things happen to people, we should be able to blame the police or anybody else," said New York University Law School professor Martin Guggenheim, who specializes in child and family law.

The defense argued that if people who knew Gregory well could not prevent his suicide, it would have been impossible to expect officers just coming upon the scene to have stopped him.

Gregory was an eighth-grader at Orchard Hills School. He had a history of psychological problems.

On the day of his death, a friend of Gregory's called the local fire department, saying Gregory was suicidal. The dispatcher contacted police, and the four officers went to Gregory's home, where they found him alone. The officers ruled out that he was suicidal and instead thought he either had perpetrated a hoax or was the victim of one. Although the phone numbers of Gregory's parents were available, the officers did not call.

In a suicide note, Gregory said he killed himself because of poor marks on a recent report card.

BIG 12 ROUNDUP

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Yes, everybody who was supposed to win did.

It was a day that left favorites feeling shaken and underdogs feeling cheated — not by opponents, but by fate.

In Columbia, Mo., there was either an incredibly lucky break or a diabolical stroke of misfortune, depending upon one's point of view. But college football's version of the Immaculate Reception enabled then-No. 1 Nebraska to tie Missouri and remain unbeaten by edging the heartbroken Tigers 45-38 in overtime.

Nebraska's tying TD came on the last play in regulation.

In Ames, it was almost as bad for the Iowa State Cyclones. They led heavily favored Colorado by as much as 18 points before Dwayne Cherrington's 1-yard plunge lifted Colorado to a 43-38 victory with 9 seconds to go.

The Big 12 South was less dramatic. No. 24 Oklahoma State made it two victories in a row at Oklahoma, vanquishing the reeling Sooners 30-7; No. 18 Texas A&M got three touchdown passes from Branndon Stewart in a 38-10 victory over Baylor. Texas Tech recovered from its latest NCAA rules embarrassment by beating down-and-out Texas 24-10.

Missouri, a 29-point underdog, was seven seconds away from one of the greatest victories in school history. Nebraska quarterback Scott Frost fired a bullet pass into the end zone for Shevin Wiggins. It was knocked out of his grasp and as bodies fell to the ground, Wiggins somehow kicked the ball into the air.

On its way down, Nebraska's Matt Davison made a diving grab just before it hit the turf. End of regulation. Game tied. The Huskers then won in overtime.

The drama did cost the Huskers the top ranking. They fell to No. 3, while Missouri cracked the poll at No. 25.

Colorado was also favored by 29. Quarterback John Hessler made a couple of critical errors but also ran for a TD and threw for another to rally Colorado (5-4, 3-3) and keep the Buffaloes' bowl hopes alive.

HOLYFIELD TRIUMPHS OVER MOORER

LAS VEGAS — Evander Holyfield came back from a biting to give Michael Moorer a beating.

Holyfield knocked Moorer down five times in a wild heavyweight title fight Saturday night before the fight was finally stopped with a battered Moorer sitting on his stool in the corner after the eighth round.

"He came to win," said Holyfield, who added Moorer's IBF heavyweight title to his WBA belt in one of the fiercest title fights in years. "When a guy comes to win it's always going to be a good fight."

Holyfield knocked Moorer down twice in the seventh round and twice more in the eighth round.

"I was going to keep getting up," Moorer said.

But ring doctor Flip Homansky wouldn't give Moorer a chance to get up again. He looked at Moorer in the corner and told referee Mitch Halpern to wave the fight to a close.

"Every time he got knocked down, he got up and answered my questions," Halpern said. "The last time he did not answer my question."

"When you're in a battle, you don't feel anything," said Moorer, two purple welts on the right side of his head. "But I feel it now. My head is pounding."

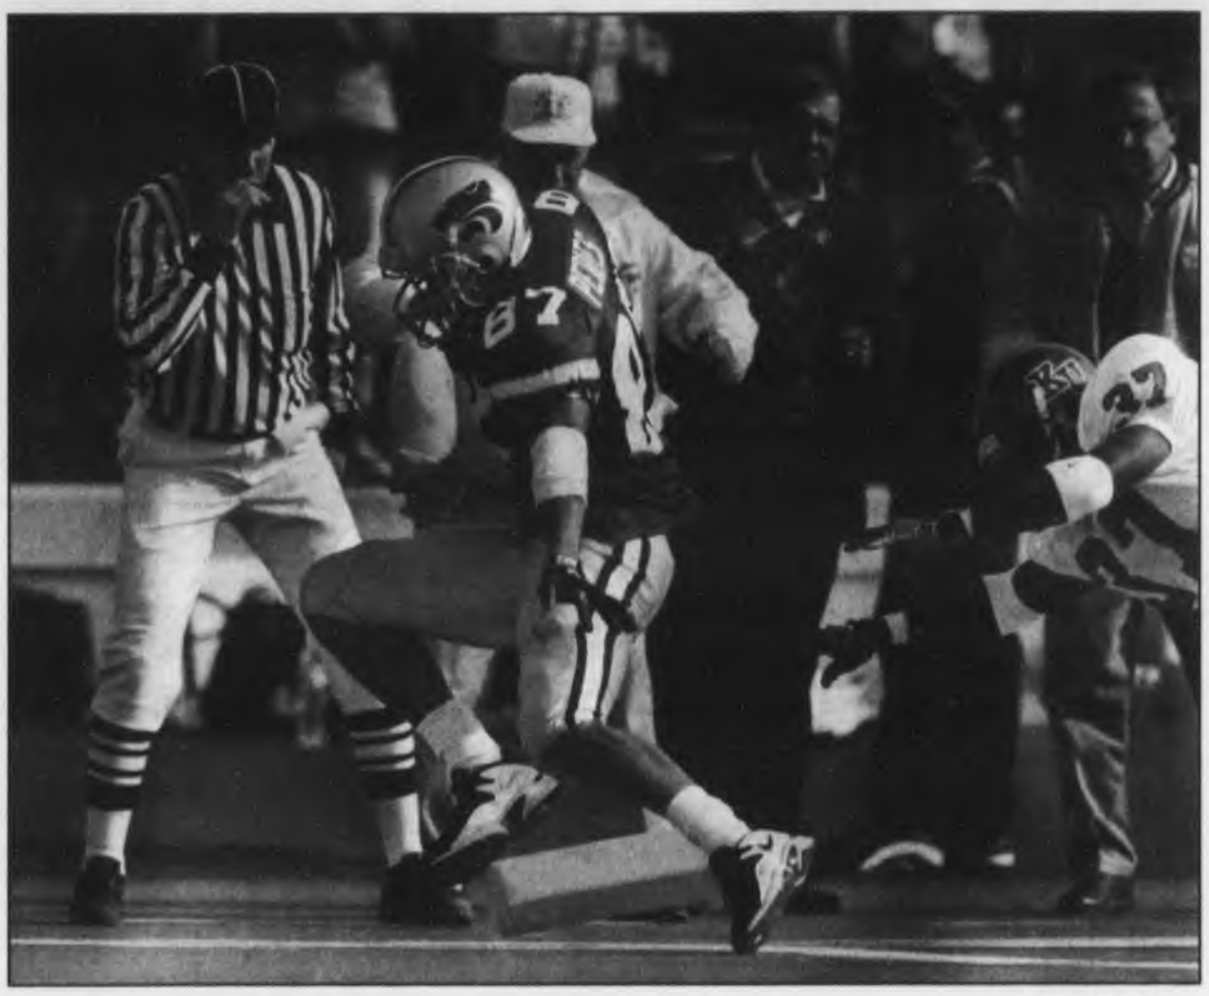
Moorer dropped to 39-2, and Holyfield improved his record to 35-3.

LONGHORNS LOSE CENTER FOR SEASON

AUSTIN, Texas — Texas center Carla Littleton will be lost to the Longhorns women's basketball team for the season after suffering a torn knee ligament during Tuesday's Orange-White scrimmage, team officials announced Friday.

A magnetic resonance image of the 6-foot-4 sophomore from Junction City was diagnosed Friday with a torn anterior cruciate ligaments in her right knee, which will require reconstructive surgery.

No date for the surgery has been determined, said UT women's basketball coach Jody Conradt.



Last season, Littleton played in 23 games for the 22-8 Longhorns. She came off the bench to score 5.4 points and grab 4.5 rebounds per game in an average of 11 minutes per contest.

She also competed on Texas' outdoor track and field team and placed second in the shot put at the Big 12 Conference Championships, helping the Longhorns to the title.

WIDE RECEIVER GAVIN PERIES touches just inside the end zone for a touchdown against KU Saturday at KSU Stadium.

K-State whips intrastate rival

SUN DEE MILLS
sports editor

In nature, birds have an innate fear of cats.

On Wagner Field Saturday afternoon, the birds from along I-70 East showed no signs of fear in K-State fans' favorite matchup of the season. Those Wildcat fans left happy with a 48-16 victory in the 95th Sunflower Showdown.

"You hear that KU has the No. 112 offense in the nation," linebacker Jeff Kelly said. "They came out ready to play, and they were ready to play hard."

The Cats scored touchdowns on their first two drives, a 28-yard hook-up from Cat quarterback Michael Bishop to wide receiver Gavin Peries and a perfectly placed 63-yard lob pass from Bishop to Cat wideout Darnell McDonald. Peries said Bishop is mastering the touch pass.

"Not only is he accurate, but now he's throwing with touch," he said. "He has such a hard arm, but now he's learned how to put a touch on it."

But Cat mistakes befell the apparent domination of the scoreboard. Cat punt returner David Allen fumbled a punt that the Jayhawks recovered at the K-State 12-yard line, setting the Hawks up for a field goal and their first score of the game.

"I took my eyes off the ball," Allen said. "It just got out of my hands."

As the first quarter ended, the Cats had a total of two rushing yards while the Hawks had amassed 77. Passing was a different story. Bishop had passed for 122 yards, and Hawk quarterback Zac Wegner had 12 to his credit.

"Last week (at Texas Tech) I had a terrible game," Bishop said. "I was waiting to get back on the field and get a chance to play ball again."

Bishop's one mistake was costly. At the start of the second quarter, Bishop threw an interception to KU's Patrick Brown at the K-State 17-yard line. This led to KU's first touchdown, a 6-yard rush by Hawk running back David Winbush.

The five-point differential was the lowest it would be the whole game. On the kickoff following Winbush's TD, Cat kickoff returner Gerald Neasman took advantage of some good Cat blocking and raced 99 yards for the Cats' third TD of the game.

"Nobody has more talent than Gerald," defensive coordinator Mike Stoops said. "He's just been with us for not even a semester yet. With his potential, he has the chance to be a big player."

KU running back Eric Vann was key in driving the Hawks 71 yards to the K-State 4-yard line in 10 plays, but was also key in giving up the ball to the Cats. Cat defensive end Darren Howard forced Vann to fumble the ball at the four, and Kelly recovered it at the six.

More successful Cat passing by Bishop combined with a balanced rushing effort moved the ball 91 yards to the KU three, but the Cats came up just shy of a first down. Kicker Martin Gramatica put a 21-yard field goal through the Special teams show signs of brilliance in 48-16 win

SAM FELSENFELD
staff writer

K-State beat Kansas for the fifth-consecutive year Saturday, dominating from the kickoff and improving to 8-1 on the season, 5-1 in Big 12 Conference play.

The final score was 1-1.

That is, Gerald Neasman 1, David Allen 1.

Neasman, the Wildcats' kickoff returner, and Allen, who brings back punts for K-State, have a little competition going each time they go out on the field. The two special-teams standouts score points when they have a return for a touchdown.

The winner doesn't get anything more than bragging rights, but when the two fight it out on the field, the winner is usually K-State.

"The special teams took them out of the game," K-State wide receiver Gavin Peries said. "Every time they made a big play or they scored, we answered."

Neasman got on the board first, returning a kickoff 99 yards for a touchdown in the second quarter. But Allen answered, bringing a punt back 70 yards for a touchdown 44 seconds into the third quarter.

"Our return units were excellent. Gerald Neasman did a lot of nice things today," K-State coach Bill Snyder said. "He ran one back, but you gotta have blockers, and I thought our guys really did a nice job."

Neasman was solid on his first return, breaking tackles and bringing the ball 27 yards to the K-State 37-yard line.

The next time Kansas kicked off, though, he got it right, running 99 yards up the sideline.

The return was the second-longest in K-State history, and the first kickoff return for a touchdown since Sept. 17, 1984, against Colorado, the last time the Cats beat the Buffaloes.

"He's got explosiveness, and he's very quick," Snyder said. "He's very capable. He might be a dynamite player. I've never had any doubt about his ability to return the ball."

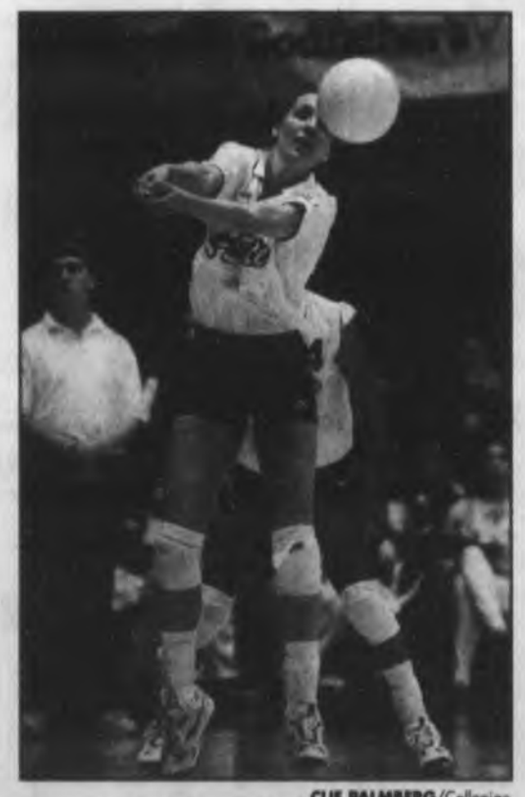
Allen also showed signs of brilliance returning, although he had to wait a little while to get his chance. Dean Royal's first punt for Kansas sailed out of bounds after traveling only 19 yards.

On Royal's second punt, Allen tried to catch the ball but Kansas' Chad Coellner leveled him before he had a chance, drawing a 15-yard penalty.

Allen had a good chance to return Royal's third punt. He was standing on the K-State 12, ready to bring the ball back. But he dropped it and Kansas recovered at the Cats' 12 and eventually scored a field goal.

"I took my eyes off the ball and it hit off my hands and I fumbled," he said. "You make mistakes, and you can only come back and hope to do something better for yourself."

Allen finally returned the Hawks' fourth punt for 11 yards and made up for his fumble less than a minute into the second half.



Normally, Allen returns punts up the left or right sideline. But for the first time this season, he ran a middle return. The experiment paid off as he ran it 70 yards for a score.

"I caught the ball and looked up, and the guys in front of me did a good job blocking," Allen said. "It parted like the Red Sea, and I went right up the middle for a touchdown."

The touchdown returns helped K-State on the scoreboard, but they hurt the Cats on defense. Neasman's return didn't give the defense much time to rest, as the offense didn't get a chance to run any plays. During that stretch of the game, K-State's defense spent 34 of 41 plays on the field, including 23 of 26 at one point.

But the members of K-State's "Lynch Mob" defense didn't mind the extra work.

"You can't complain about it," K-State defensive end Joe Bob Clements said. "They're putting points on the board, and the more points they put on the board, the less pressure it puts on the defense. I'd rather have them running kicks back and scoring quick than opposed to what we had going on last week."

K-STATE SWING HITTER KIM ZSCHAU returns the ball to Oklahoma Friday night in Ahearn Field House.

Sooners beat Cats in another 5-game match

DAN MERKER
assistant sports editor

Although Yogi Berra wasn't in attendance, it was "deja vu all over again" for the K-State volleyball team Friday at Ahearn Field House.

For the second time this season, the Oklahoma Sooners won a five-game match against the Wildcats. K-State fell to 18-8 on the season, and 9-5 in Big 12 play. The Sooners improved to 14-10 and 8-5 in the Big 12.

"We went 2-1/2 hours again," setter Devon Ryning said. "It's so emotionally draining and mentally draining to work that hard and not get it in the end."

The visiting Sooners got seven points on outside hitter Melissa Peterson's serve before K-State managed a sideout in the first game. The Cats managed to rally to within 10-7, but OU took control of the game and, despite the Cats surviving two game points, won 15-11.

K-State jumped out to a 4-1 lead in the second game, but the Sooners again went on a run. With Peterson serving, OU scored seven consecutive points to take an 8-4 lead. The Cats answered back immediately with five straight points of their own on swing hitter Kim Zschau's serve to regain the lead at 9-8.

OU took the lead for the final time in the game at 13-12 before the Cats scored the final three points of the game on outside hitter Dawn Cady's serve. A block by middle blocker Kelle Branting sent the teams to the locker rooms tied at one game apiece.

Game three was back and forth. The largest lead either team would enjoy was K-State's 4-0 edge at the beginning of the game. The Sooners would grab a 14-11 lead, just one point away from a 2-1 lead in the match, but the Cats fought back. They managed to take a 15-14 lead, but OU came back and had game point at 16-15. An attack by Peterson missed the court, giving the Cats another life. K-State would also go down 17-16 and survive.

A hitting error by Sooner outside hitter Patrice Arrington gave the Cats an 18-17 lead, and a kill by Zschau ended the marathon game 19-17 and gave the Cats a 2-1 lead in the match. The game was virtually even, with K-State hitting .294 and OU hitting .296 in the third game.

The Sooners served the third game seven times, and the Cats survived all seven. But those seven lives, along with the two K-State used in game one, meant the Cats used up all nine lives. The Sooners then took control of the match.

Branting said the difference in play between the third and fourth games was mental.

"Emotionally, we were on two different levels from that third game to the fourth game," she said. "We've just got to work on our mental toughness. We can't let down at those critical times like we did tonight."

Ryning agreed the letdown was mental.

"Volleyball is honestly 80 percent mental," Ryning said. "It comes to a point where no one really cares if you're tired. You've just got to go."

The Sooners never trailed in either game four or game five, and won them 15-6 and 15-7, respectively. The Sooners dominated the Cats in both games, outhitting K-State .447 to .129 in game four and .333 to -.067 in game five.

"We're going to look back at this game and say we should have won this, and I think that's what's disappointing about this loss," Ryning said.

Head coach Jim McLaughlin said he was proud of the team's performance.

"Game three was such an emotional game, I think we experienced a little bit of a letdown, but we really played hard the whole night," McLaughlin said. "That was one of the best fights we put up. We really played hard."

HOLE in TONGUE

Popular piercings get attention, can cause infections

JEFF COOPER/Collegian

HEATHER SPENCER, joint owner of Rad-A-Tat Tattoo, displays her tongue jewelry. Tongue piercing requires six to eight weeks to completely heal.

LESLEY BAKER
staff reporter

You're sitting in a chair. A voice tells you to relax and breathe. A wire clamp settles on your tongue and holds it still. The center's marked. Relax and breathe, the voice keeps saying as the sharpened end of a needle pushes through your tongue.

Tongue piercing has become more and more popular in the past couple of years, Heather Spencer, joint owner and body-piercer for Rad-A-Tat Tattoo in Aggieville, said. Spencer said that it's because the younger generation is more accepting and open-minded about such things.

"Some people believe that you should get your ears pierced and nothing more," Spencer said. "It's been in other culture and tribes. It's not something that's new."

In tongue piercing, the tongue is clamped in an extended position to hold it still for the piercing. The needle goes through the center of the tongue. Spencer said most people get barbells, but studs are also available. After the piercing, the tongue is swollen for two or three days to a week and soft foods are recommended. Infections can happen if the piercing is not taken care of, or if the person smokes heavily during the healing process and doesn't rinse afterward.

"For a few days it was swollen," Allyson Kirk, freshman in hotel and restaurant management, said of her tongue piercing. "I could eat mac and cheese because it's soft. But in a few days it went down."

But why would a person voluntarily let someone clamp and shove a needle through their tongue?

"Everyone gets them for different reasons," Spencer said. "They just want to get it done. That's the most common reason. It's something different. A lot of people do it because their friends do it."

"I've wanted to get it for a few years," Kirk said. "I like the look of it."

"My friends have had one," said Valerie Baker, sophomore in pre-med at Ottawa University, who is debating getting her tongue pierced. "They say it's kind of fun to have one. Because when you,re sitting in a class and you're really bored, it's like having a sucker in your mouth. That clicking noise when you talk is pretty cool, too."

When asked about the myth of tongue piercing improving oral sex, Spencer said it probably does, but most people don't tell that to their body-piercer. Others asked had no comment.

Tongue piercings do have their advantages, such as a definite conversation piece, Spencer said.

"It's kind of a conversation piece," Kirk said. "I play with it a lot during boring classes."

Are there any disadvantages to tongue piercing?

"I can't roll my tongue," Kirk said. "I used to be able to roll my r's. I can't give blood for a year."

Kirk said that for the first few days, talking tired her because of the tongue ring.

Having a tongue piercing can also affect whether you become employed and stay employed.

"I've heard of a lot of people getting fired because their boss didn't like it," Spencer said. "People don't approve of it."

"We have restrictions," Russ Loub, general manager at Little Apple Brewery, said. "We don't like things flaunted at work. We don't condone it, but we won't not hire someone because of it. These days it's almost impossible to find someone without a tattoo or piercing."

"That's not an issue we'd frown upon," Craig Wilson, team leader at The Buckle, said. "That's a person, and that's what they're all about. Personality stands out. "

Besides social repercussions, does having your tongue pierced affect your health in any way?

"The human mouth is rife with infection-causing germs," Dr. Robert D. Ecklund, Lafene Health Center physician, said of tongue piercing. "You're introducing a foreign body and puncture wound to the tongue, which is sitting in this melee of infection-causing germs."

Ecklund said he hasn't treated any tongue infections due to piercings, but he has treated ear infections due to piercing.

Tongue piercings are becoming more popular, despite social and economic disapproval. Spencer usually does five to 10 piercings a day. The most popular piercings for men and women, Spencer said, are eyebrows, tongues and lips. The going price for a tongue piercing at Rad-A-Tat Tattoo is $50 for one barbell and $75 for a second barbell or stud. Fine Line Tattoo Inc. in Topeka asks $25 for the piercing and barbells start at $25. Kirk got her tongue piercing for $45 at Creation Station in Lawrence.

"I would recommend against body piercing," Ecklund said. "Because it does promote infection and can be expensive and deforming because of doctor visits, deformity and reconstructive surgery."

"I like it so far," Kirk said of her tongue piercing. "You can't really see it unless I laugh real loud. Most people don't know it's there unless I show them."

Kirk said she will probably take out her piercing before she goes looking for a

Theater company inflates audience's expectations, imagination

JAMI NELSON
staff reporter

Envision a juggling circus act, a high school geometry class, a ballet recital and a color wheel, and you have the Fred Garbo Inflatable Theatre Co.

Scheduled for 3 p.m. Sunday at McCain Auditorium, the show could not begin until after the performers' luggage arrived from an airline mix-up. At 3:05 p.m., the performers received the trunks containing costumes and a few props. For most performers, this would have been a big setback. But Fred Garbo took it all in stride.

Theater Review

Garbo posted himself in the McCain entrance, welcoming guests and explaining the dilemma. Intermingling with the crowd, he was not backstage warming up but instead making his audience feel at home. His personal approach to performing continued throughout the program.

For the performance, Garbo and Daielma Santos, the Fred Garbo Inflatable Theatre Co.'s only performers, used common shapes like cubes and cylinders to create living, breathing images.

Although they performed many times as themselves, both performers also assumed roles inside the shapes. The geometric costumes were light and allowed the performers to move freely. The brightly colored costumes deflated and inflated enough to allow a full range of movement.

The art was both visual and acoustical. Some acts used well-known classical songs while others backed the imagery with new-wave music. The background music was appropriate for each act as the shapes often trembled and tumbled to the music.

The variety of entertainment kept the audience members wondering just what was next. While Garbo juggled rings, flaming torches and 5-foot inflatable cubes, Santos rippled red- and white-striped streamers and an object that resembled a multi-colored windsock. And it was always a guess as to who was inside the shapes.

The stage lights and colorful objects complemented the technical skills of Garbo and Santos. Garbo displayed more technique in tumbling and stand-up comedy. He often cracked jokes or mimed actions, which brought laughter to both old and young. He was truly humorous, and his quips added bits of humor to the abstract concepts of the performance.

Bringing a sense of grace and beauty to the performance, Santos toe-shoed and glided about the stage.

Her presence in the performance gave it a sense of culture and structure as her technique wove together the performance's imagery.

In one of the final acts, Garbo introduced "Fred Zeppelin, the Inflatable Man," as he climbed into a purple and red suit. He then inflated the suit himself and added a pair of neon-green sunglasses and a white baseball cap to his attire. Giving him an appearance similar to the Nebraska Cornhuskers' inflatable mascot, Garbo did hand stands on a folding chair and danced about the stage.

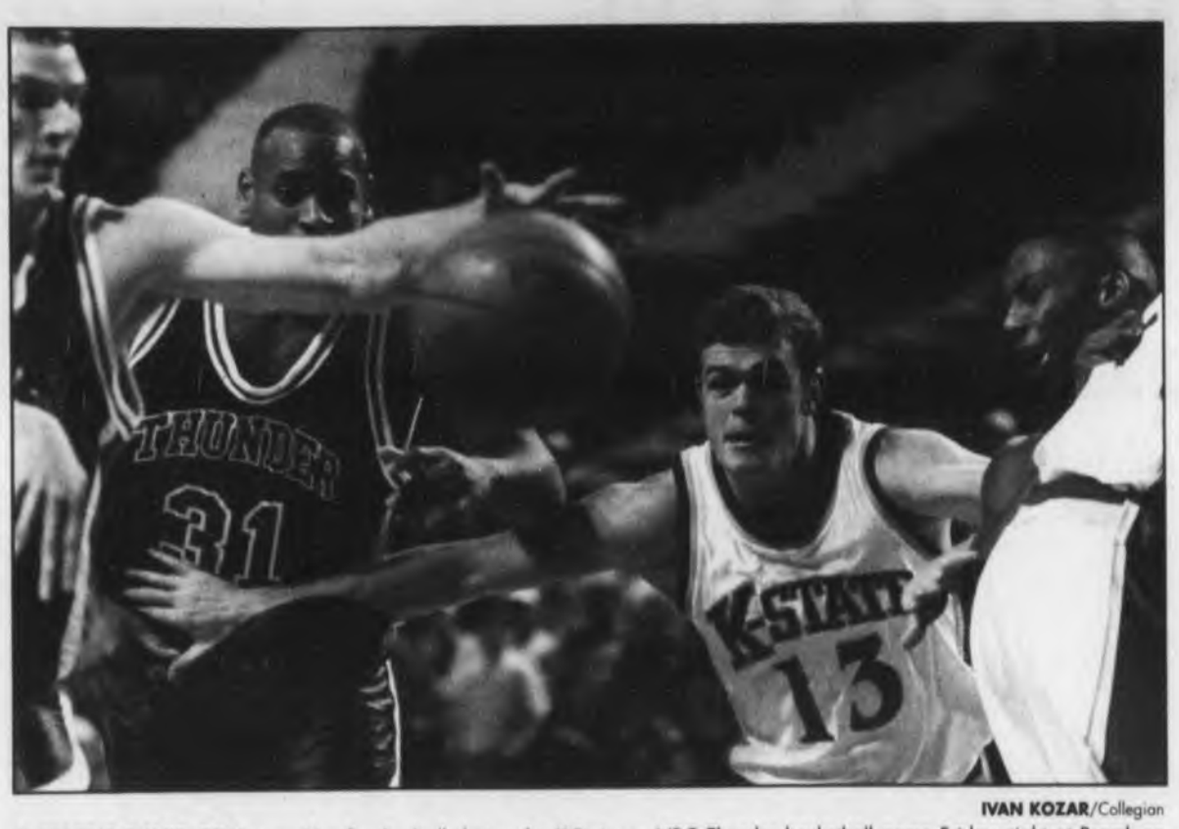
Just as the show began with audience members not knowing what to expect, it ended the same way. There was no formal applause session to end the performance.

Instead, Garbo treated the audience with a chance to bat around his inflatable shapes.

So he and Santos gladly watched as children sat on the shoulders of their parents to have a better swing at the shapes and adults jumped to touch a 6-foot inflatable pumpkin.

The Fred Garbo Inflatable Theatre Co. took common shapes and gave them life.

Its performance followed the format of a circus, with act after act defying the audience's imagination.



Garbo and Santos provided the chance for audience members to think at a higher, abstract level yet regress to the playful times of childhood.

Cats lose 1st exhibtion game

The Wildcats couldn't overcome a slow start in the first half as they lost to NBC Thunder 85-73 in their first exhibition game Friday night at Bramlage Coliseum.

After the team failed to score on their first three possessions, senior guard Aaron Swartzendruber put the Cats on the scoreboard with a three-point shot. The Cats came up empty on their next four possessions, and at the 15-minute mark in the first half, K-State was trailing 15-3.

The Cats' woes continued as they shot 28 percent from the field while the Thunder shot 64 percent from the field in the first half. The Thunder led the Cats 50-24 at halftime.

Coach Tom Asbury blamed equal substituting and playing time for the Cats' lack of flow and continuity in their first-half offense.

The Cats turned up defensive intensity and the shooting in the second half.

Swartzendruber, junior forward Shawn Rhodes, sophomore guard Duane Davis and sophomore guard Josh Reid each had two steals in the second half which set up transition baskets.

The Cats held the Thunder to 44 percent shooting from the field in the second half while they hit 59 percent from the field.

Four Cats scored in double figures. Swartzendruber led the team with 19 points, followed by senior forward Marcus McCollough (11), Reid (11), and Rhodes (10).

"I thought Aaron played real well," Asbury said. "He took one goofy, last-year shot, but he's real comfortable at the off-guard."

Junior guard Ayome May, the Cats' highest-scoring returner, came off the bench and scored four points, hitting two of nine in 14 minutes of play.

"I didn't start Paco because I already know what he can do," Asbury said. "Although I wasn't overly pleased with what he did do."

Freshman point guard Adam Lopez made the decision at noon Friday that he would not redshirt this season.

"It was a matter of wanting to come out and help the team," Lopez said.

Lopez helped the team where he wasn't expected to — on the boards. He led the team with six rebounds, scored five points and dished out three assists.

"I had some first-game jitters, but in the second half, I started to get into the flow of the game," Lopez said.

Although the Cats out-rebounded the Thunder 34-30, the Cats' big men lacked productivity on the boards. Seven-feet tall freshman center Joe Leonard had only three rebounds in 20 minutes of play. Rhodes also had only three rebounds in the game.

"I definitely need to rebound better and box my man out," Rhodes said. "It's something we're going to work hard on in practice."

The bulk of the rebounding was handled by Lopez with six followed by Swartzendruber with four, Reid with three, and junior guard Chris Griffin with three.

The Thunder used the good outside shooting of Shann Ferch to beat the Cats, making 10 out of 20 three-pointers in the game.

Ferch made five of eights shots from three-point range to pace the Thunder with 20 points. Ferch played for Asbury at Pepperdine during the 1988-'89 and 1989-'90 seasons.

Asbury said the Cats didn't do a good job of fighting through the screens set for Ferch, which opened him up at three-point range.

"We lost him a few times, and that was probably the difference in the game," Asbury said.

The Thunder put four players in double-figure scoring. Guard Nico Harrison had 16 points, forward Adam Leachman scored 15, and guard Tyrone McDaniel scored 13.

NBC Thunder's coach, Danny Beard, a former all-Big 8 starter for K-State, said the Cats had reason to be behind the Thunder in their first exhibition game.

"This is their first game, and we've played two games against Division I clubs, and we're veterans," Beard said. "They'll get where they need to be."

The Cats play their final exhibition game at 7:05 p.m. tonight against the KU's real team will win Big 12 Championship

Because the Sunflower Showdown went as expected this weekend, I decided it wasn't even worth writing about.

Instead, I'm turning my attention to college basketball to make a shocking prediction about our most hated rivals. The Jayhawks will win the Big 12 Conference.

OK, so it doesn't exactly take the Psychic Friends' Network to make that statement. After all, they have two preseason all-Americans in Raef LaFrentz and Paul Pierce, with a strong supporting cast behind them.

The Hawks did lose Jacque Vaughn and Scot Pollard to graduation, but they did just fine without each of them during significant chunks of last year's 34-2 run.

To make things a little more interesting, let's pretend that Pierce and LaFrentz decided to turn pro and the Hawks are relying heavily on newcomers to defend their title.

You know what? I'd still pick KU to win the conference, because their success isn't defined by a few players. It goes way beyond that.

They've got 100 years of basketball tradition backing them up, the top coach in the country, Allen Fieldhouse — one of the best atmospheres in all of sports — and they're always in the national spotlight.

All of this attracts the top recruits in the nation to Lawrence year after year.

In other words, one setback will not keep the Hawks from winning.

If they lost their best players to the NBA, they'd just reload with new recruits. If Roy Williams ever decides to go to North Carolina, they'd find another top-notch coach eager to fill his shoes. If Allen Fieldhouse burned down, they'd build another arena and still win the Big 12.

You've heard the term "dynasty" used to describe teams like the Chicago Bulls and the Dallas Cowboys? Well, that's what the Hawks have, only their dynasty is now entering its 100th year.

I know I sound like one of those pathetic K-State students who cheers for the Cats during football season and the Hawks during basketball season, but that just isn't the case.

If there was a PFEJ organization (People For the Extinction of Jayhawks), I would not only be a member, but I'd also be the president.

In fact, I hate the Hawks so much I've been in denial about their dominance over the past 10 years or so. I said things like:

"I can't believe we lost to KU at home. Oh well, we'll get 'em next year." (A statement I made after the Hawks beat the Cats in 1984 at Ahearn. The Hawks have now won 14 straight in Manhattan.)

"There's no way Danny Manning and the boys can beat Mitch Richmond and the men." (A statement I made before the Elite Eight matchup in 1988 in which the Jayhawks defeated the Cats and went on to win the national championship.)

"Oh, Larry Brown is leaving? KU is going down." (A statement I made when some unknown assistant from North Carolina took over as head coach of the Hawks in 1988. Williams' career record at KU now stands at 247-58.)

"The Hawks just signed some guy named Jacque as their new point guard. Everybody knows they can't play basketball in France." (A statement I made after Jacque Vaughn joined the Jayhawks. During his four-year career, the Hawks were 115-21.)

Anyway, my denial period is over, and the bottom line is it's going to take a big disaster to keep the Hawks from winning championships until well after our kids are ready to don the purple and white of K-State.

Don't worry, though, if you're still in denial about the power of the Hawks. You're not the only one who has trouble dealing with reality.

I've heard that some Jayhawk fans actually thought they had a chance of winning this past weekend against the Cats.

uprights to put the Cats up by 21, the spread for the game.

"Maybe my prayers helped," Gramatica said. "I say the same prayer every time. It's in Spanish, and I just say it over and over when I am on the field."

But as the Cats headed to the locker room, the stats on paper looked as if KU was the dominant team. The Cats had just one more first down, only 25 yards on the ground, six penalties and less time of possession.

At the same time, Bishop had completed eight of 11 passes for 202 yards, a career high, while the Cats held Wegner to two-of-12 for 23 yards.

The Cats defense was out of sync, according to Stoops.

"We were overrunning our linebackers, and we just weren't real sharp," Stoops said.

Cat junior linebacker Travis Ochs said defensive efforts were stifled due to lack of time to communicate.

"We couldn't piece it together," Ochs said. "It took a while to figure out where people were. You don't have time to organize when you only have one play off to talk about it."

But no one was complaining about the Cats' special teams' efforts, least of all the other players.

"Special teams can win games sometimes," Peries said. "Ours took them out of the game."

In the second half, the "Lynch Mob" mentality appeared on the field as well as more special team tricks. On K-State's opening drive, Allen redeemed his earlier flub by returning the punt 70 yards for a touchdown. Snyder said he could have lived without the earlier mistake.

"I don't know if that's a fair trade-off," Snyder said. "I don't particularly like that trade."

The Cats didn't stop scoring. Bishop hooked up with Peries again for a touchdown, Gramatica contributed a second field goal from 25 yards and Neasman took the Cats' first interception of the season to the end zone to put the Cats at 48 points.

"The kids did a nice job of blocking as well today," Snyder said. "We got an interception, and we haven't had an interception since my 29th birthday here," he joked.

The Hawks scored a touchdown with 6:15 left in the game. By then the game was a forgone conclusion, although the players weren't feeling too terrific about their performance.

"The score didn't depict how tough the game was," said defensive end Joe Bob Clements, who recorded his first career sack. "Maybe we weren't ready for them as much as we should have been."
